This volume of al-Ṭabarī’s History has a particularly wide sweep and interest. It provides the most complete and detailed historical source for the Persian empire of the Sasanids, whose four centuries of rule were one of the most glorious periods in Persia’s long history. It also gives information on the history of pre-Islamic Arabs of the Mesopotamian desert fringes and eastern Arabia (in al-Ḥira and the Ghassānid kingdom), and on the quite separate civilization of South Arabia, the Yemen, otherwise known mainly by inscriptions. It furnishes details of the centuries’-long warfare of the two great empires of Western Asia, the Sasanids and the Byzantine Greeks, a titanic struggle which paved the way for the subsequent rise of the new faith of Islam. The volume is thus of great value for scholars, from Byzantinists to Semitists and Iranists. It provides the first English translation of this key section of al-Ṭabarī’s work, one for which non-Arabists have hitherto relied on a partial German translation, meritorious for its time but now 120 years old. This new translation is enriched by a detailed commentary which takes into account up-to-date scholarship.

The State University of New York Press
THE HISTORY OF AL-ŢABARĪ
AN ANNOTATED TRANSLATION

VOLUME V

The Sāsānids, the Byzantines, the Lakhmids, and Yemen
The History of al-Ṭabarī

Editorial Board
Ihsan Abbas, University of Jordan, Amman
C. E. Bosworth, The University of Manchester
Franz Rosenthal, Yale University
Everett K. Rowson, The University of Pennsylvania
Ehsan Yar-Shater, Columbia University (General Editor)

Center for Iranian Studies
Columbia University

SUNY
SERIES IN NEAR EASTERN STUDIES
Said Amir Arjomand, Editor

The preparation of this volume was made possible in part by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, an independent federal agency.
The History of al-Ṭabarī
(Ta'rikh al-rusul wa'l-mulūk)

Volume V

The Sāsānids, the Byzantines, the Lakhmids, and Yemen translated and annotated by

C. E. Bosworth

University of Manchester

State University of New York Press
THE HISTORY OF PROPHETS AND KINGS (Ta’rikh al-rusul wa’l-mulūk) by Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad b. Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (839–923), here rendered as The History of al-Ṭabarī, is by common consent the most important universal history produced in the world of Islam. It has been translated here in its entirety for the first time for the benefit of non-Arabists, with historical and philological notes for those interested in the particulars of the text.

In his monumental work al-Ṭabarī explores the history of the ancient nations, with special emphasis on biblical peoples and prophets, the legendary and factual history of ancient Iran, and, in great detail, the rise of Islam, the life of the Prophet Muḥammad, and the history of the Islamic world down to the year 915. The first volume of this translation contains a biography of al-Ṭabarī and a discussion of the method, scope, and value of his work. It also provides information on some of the technical considerations that have guided the work of the translators. The thirty-ninth volume is a compendium of biographies of early members of the Muslim community, compiled by al-Ṭabarī, although not strictly a part of his History, it complements it.

The History has been divided here into thirty-nine volumes, each of which covers about two hundred pages of the original Arabic text in the Leiden edition. An attempt has been made to draw the dividing lines between the individual volumes in such a way that each is to some degree independent and can be read as such. The page numbers of the Leiden edition appear in the margins of the translated volumes.
Al-Ṭabarî very often quotes his sources verbatim and traces the chain of transmission (isnād) to an original source. The chains of transmitters are, for the sake of brevity, rendered by only a dash (—) between the individual links in the chain. Thus, “According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq” means that al-Ṭabarî received the report from Ibn Ḥumayd, who said that he was told by Salamah, who said that he was told by Ibn Isḥāq, and so on. The numerous subtle and important differences in the original Arabic wording have been disregarded.

The table of contents at the beginning of each volume gives a brief survey of the topics dealt with in that particular volume. It also includes the headings and subheadings as they appear in al-Ṭabarî’s text, as well as those occasionally introduced by the translator.

Well-known place names, such as, for instance, Mecca, Baghdad, Jerusalem, Damascus, and the Yemen, are given in their English spellings. Less common place names, which are the vast majority, are transliterated. Biblical figures appear in the accepted English spelling. Iranian names are usually transcribed according to their Arabic forms, and the presumed Iranian forms are often discussed in the footnotes.

Technical terms have been translated wherever possible, but some, such as dirham, and imām, have been retained in Arabic forms. Others that cannot be translated with sufficient precision have been retained and italicized, as well as footnoted.

The annotation is aimed chiefly at clarifying difficult passages, identifying individuals and place names, and discussing textual difficulties. Much leeway has been left to the translators to include in the footnotes whatever they consider necessary and helpful.

The bibliographies list all the sources mentioned in the annotation.

The index in each volume contains all the names of persons and places referred to in the text, as well as those mentioned in the notes as far as they refer to the medieval period. It does not include the names of modern scholars. A general index, it is hoped, will appear after all the volumes have been published.

For further details concerning the series and acknowledgments, see the preface to Volume I.

Ehsan Yar-Shater
Contents

Preface / v

Abbreviations / xiii

Translator's Foreword / xv

Tables 1. The Sasanid Emperors / xxv
   2. The Roman and Byzantine Emperors, from Constantine the Great to Heraclius / xxvii
   3. The Lakhmid Rulers / xxviii
   4. The Chiefs of Kindah / xxix
   5. Rulers in South Arabia during the Sixth and Early Seventh Centuries / xxx

Maps 1. The Sasanid Empire / xxxi
   2. The Roman-Byzantine and Persian
      Frontierlands / xxxii
   3. The Northeastern Frontier of the Sasanids / xxxiii
   4. The Arabian Peninsula: the lands of the Lakhmids, Kindah, etc. / xxxiv
   5. Southwestern Arabia / xxxv viii

Contents

[The Kings of the Persians] / 1

[Ardashir I] / 2

[The History of al-Ḥirah] / 20

Mention of the Holders of Power in the Kingdom of Persia after Ardashir b. Bābak / 23

[Sābūr I, called Sābūr al-Junūd] / 23

[Hurmuz I] / 40

[Bahrām I] / 43

[The History of al-Ḥirah] / 44

[Bahrām II] / 46

[Bahrām III] / 47

[Narsi] / 48

[Hurmuz II] / 49

[Sābūr II Dhū al-Aktāf] / 50

[The History of al-Ḥirah] / 67

[Ardashir II] / 67

[Sābūr III] / 68

[Bahrām IV] / 69

[Yazdajird I] / 70

[The History of al-Ḥirah] / 74
Contents

[Bahrām V Ḥūr] / 82

[Yazdājird II] / 106

[Fayrūz I] / 109

Mention of Events in the Reigns of Yazdājird (II), Son of Bahrām (V), and Fayrūz, and the Relations of Their Respective Governors with the Arabs and the People of Yemen / 121

[Balāsh] / 126

[Qubādh I] / 128

Mention of What Has Been Recorded Concerning the Events Taking Place Among the Arabs in Qubādh's Reign in His Kingdom and Involving His Governors / 139

[Kisrā I Anūsharwān] / 146

[The History of al-Ḥīrah] / 162

[The History of Yemen]
Mention of the Rest of the Story of Tubba in the Days of Qubādh and the Time of Anūsharwān and the Persians' Dispatch of an Army to Yemen in Order to Combat the Abyssinians, and the Reason for This Last / 164

[Resumption of the History of Kisrā Anūsharwān] / 252

Mention of the Birth of the Messenger of God / 268

[The Remainder of Kisrā Anūsharwān's Reign and the Last Sāsānid Kings] / 285

[Hurmuz] / 295

[Kisrā II Abarwīz] / 305
Mention of Those Who Say That (i.e., those who say that the words of Sūrat al-Rūm refer to Abarwīz’s defeat of Hiraql) / 324

Mention of the Account Concerning the Events That Happened when God Wished to Take Away from the people of Persia Rule over Persia, and the Arabs’ Overrunning It by Means of God’s Favoring Them with His Prophet Muḥammad, Involving the Prophethood, the Caliphate, the Royal Power, and the Dominion, in the Days of Kṣrā Abarwīz / 331

[The Encounter at Dhū Qār] / 338

Mention of Those Vassal Rulers Set over the Desert Frontier of the Arabs at al-Ḥīrah as Appointees of the Monarchs of Persia, after ‘Amr b. Hind / 370

The Story Returns to the Mention of al-Marūzān, Who Governed Yemen on Behalf of Hurmuz and His Son Abarwīz, and His Successors / 373

[Qubāḍh II Shīrūyah] / 381

[Ardashīr III] / 400

[Shahrbarāz] / 402

Būrān / 403

[Jushnas Dih] / 405

[Āzarmīdukht] / 406

[Kṣrā III] / 407

[Khurrazādh Khusrāw] / 407

[Fayrūz II] / 408
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Contents</th>
<th>xi</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>[Farrukhzādh Khusraw] / 408</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>[Yazdajird III] / 409</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>[The Chronology of the World] / 412</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mention of Those Who Say That (i.e., that there elapsed ten centuries from Adam to Noah, a further ten from Noah to Abraham, and a further ten from Abraham to Moses) / 413</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bibliography of Cited Works / 419</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Index / 443</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Abbreviations

AAE: Arabian Archaeology and Epigraphy
AJSL: American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures
AKAW Berlin: Abhandlungen der Königlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin
AKGW Göttingen: Abhandlungen der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen AM: Asia Major
AO: Acta Orientalia
AO Hung.: Acta Orientalia Hungarica
BAR: British Archaeological Reports
BEO: Bulletin d'Etudes Orientales
BGA: Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum
BIFAO: Bulletin de l'Institut Francaise d'Archéologie Orientale
BSOAS: Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies
BZ: Byzantinische Zeitschrift
CAJ: Central Asiatic Journal
CRAIBL: Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres
DOP: Dumbarton Oaks Papers
EI: Encyclopaedia of Islam, first edition
EI2: Encyclopaedia of Islam, second edition
EIr: Encyclopaedia Iranica
Abbreviations

GMS: Gibb Memorial Series
HdO: Handbuch der Orientalistik
IA: Iranica Antiqua
IC: Islamic Culture
Iran JBIPS: Iran, Journal of the British Institute of Persian Studies
IIJ: Indo-Iranian Journal
IJMES: International Journal of Middle East Studies IS: Iranian Studies
Isl.: Der Islam
JA: Journal Asiatique
JAOS: Journal of the American Oriental Society
JESHO: Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient
JIS: Journal of Islamic Studies
JRAS: Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society
JSAI: Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam
JSS: Journal of Semitic Studies MO: Le Monde Oriental MUSJ: Mélanges de l’Université Saint-Joseph
NC: The Numismatic Chronicle
OC: Oriens Christianus
OS: Orientalia Suecana
PSAS: Proceedings of the Seminar for Arabian Studies
RHR: Revue de l'Histoire des Religions
RMMM: Revue du Monde Musulman et la Méditerranée
RSO: Rivista degli Studi Orientali
SbWAW: Sitzungsberichte der Wiener Akademie der Wissenschaften
SI: Studia Islamica
St Ir: Studia Iranica
TAVO: Tübingen Atlas des Vorderen Orients
WbKAS: Wörterbuch des klassischen arabischen Sprache
WO: Die Welt des Orients
WZKM: Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes
ZA: Zeitschrift für Assyriologie
ZDMG: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft

In citations from the Qur’ān, where two different numbers are given for a verse, the first is that of Flügel's text and the second one that of the official Egyptian edition.
The section of al-Ṭabari's History on the four centuries preceding the rise of the Prophet Muḥammad continues the nonannalistic treatment of the pre-Islamic period as a whole, but it departs from the previous retailing of stories about the Children of Israel, the earlier prophets and the ancient peoples of the Near East and Arabia, which formed the first tier of Islamic salvation history, that of a pristine monotheism which had become clouded over by idolatry and a time of ignorance before God had sent His Prophet to mankind. Instead, although we do not get the year-by-year treatment of events used for post-Islamic times, we emerge instead into something that is recognizable as real history: the origins of the successors to the Parthian Arsacids of Persia, the Sāsānids, and the subsequent four centuries' history of the dynasty; the Sāsānids' sporadic episodes of warfare with the Romans/Byzantines, and, on the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānids' empire, occasional wars with the peoples of Inner Asia, the Tūrān of Firdawsi's version of the Persian national epic, the Shāh-nāma; the Sāsānids' attempts to maintain a buffer-state on the desert fringes of Mesopotamia in the shape of the Arab Lakhmid princes who, it was hoped, would protect Mesopotamia from depredations by the Bedouins of inner Arabia; the Sāsānids' installing of military bases on the western shores of the Persian Gulf in order to turn the gulf into a Persian lake, safe for their commerce; from the fifth century onwards, an interventionist policy across central Arabia, culminating in the Persian occupation of Yemen in 570 for some sixty years; but then, at the end, the sudden disintegration of the empire at the hands of first the Byzantines and then the Muslim Arabs.

This section of al-Ṭabari’s work is thus by no means exclusively concerned with the affairs of the Persian imperial heartland proper, the Iranian plateau and Mesopotamia, where the capital Seleucia-Ctesiphon lay, but is to a considerable extent concerned with its western and southwestern fringes; that is, the Roman/Byzantine provinces of eastern Anatolia and the Semitic Near East, including such ruling Arab families as the Lakhmids of al-Ḥīrah and the chiefs of Kindah of the family of Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār in central Arabia. Much of the material in al-Ṭabari on the Sāsānids’ external relations can be corroborated or amplified from outside contemporary or near-contemporary sources. For the warfare with the Romans/Byzantines, there is a rich array of Byzantine chroniclers, some of them, like Procopius, closely connected with the military commanders concerned or, like Agathias, with a special channel of communication for knowledge of Persian affairs. For the Arabian peninsula, there is a fair amount of Arabic information, admittedly post-Islamic in the form we know it, about the Lakhmid kings and the chiefs of Kindah, arising out of the Arabs’ passion for genealogical information and its historical background and out of the need to elucidate the background of poetic activity at the court of al-Ḥīrah or in the person of a poet-chief like Imru’ al-Qays. In his translation, Geschichte der Perser und Araber zur Zeit der Sasaniden [see on this, below], Nöldeke omitted some sections of al-Ṭabari’s material on pre-Islamic Yemen, since he considered it as “zu fabelhafte” (880¹⁷–882⁴, but with 881¹⁹–882⁴ inserted out of order in his translation at 147–48; 890⁴–892¹⁴; 901¹–917¹⁷). He also omitted as irrelevant to his general topic 966¹⁵–981², on the miraculous birth and early upbringing of the Prophet Muḥammad, and the closing section in this Prima series, vol. 2, 1069¹⁷–1072²⁰, on the chronology of the world from Adam to the Prophet’s birth. With regard to the South Arabian material, during the 1870s, with little more secondary material available on the history of the pre-Islamic Arabs than A. P. Caussin de Perceval’s attempt at making historical bricks without straw, his Essai sur l’histoire des Arabyes avant l’Islamisme, pendant l’époque de Mahomet et jusqu’à la réduction de toutes les tribus sous la loi musulmane (Paris 1847–48), this must have seemed substantially the case. Only from the early 1870s, through the pioneer efforts of scholarly travelers like Halévy in copying inscriptions on the spot, with his subsequent decipherment of the script and then further elucidation of the material by D. H. Müller and others, did knowledge begin to emerge of the rich but patchy heritage of South Arabian inscriptions (and also, around this time, of inscriptions in other languages of the peninsula like Thamudic, Lihyanitic, Safaitic, etc.). Nöldeke was of course aware of the pioneer discoveries and publications here, but the material was still meager in quantity and philologically difficult to evaluate. During the course of the present century, the study of Epigraphic South Arabian has emerged as a fully grown branch of Semitic studies, and we now have confirmation—if at times in an allusive rather than direct manner—of several apparently “fabelhafte” events in al-Ṭabarānī’s presentation of South Arabian history. Nor should one forget the significant quantity of material in Syriac and other languages of the Christian Orient that has now come to light and has illuminated the formation of an indigenous Christian church in Southwestern Arabia and such episodes as the struggle for political power and influence there involving such outside powers as Abyssinia, Byzantium, and Persia. Even the history of the lands beyond Persia’s northeastern frontier has had a certain amount of fresh illumination thrown upon it by recent work on the Western Turk empire and on the Kushans, Kidarites, and Hephthalites, utilizing the results of such disciplines as archaeology, numismatics, and epigraphy; and the emergence in the last decade of material from a family archive in what is now northern Afghanistan will almost certainly increase our knowledge of the history and language of Bactria, the later Islamic Ṭukhāristān, in its pre-Islamic phase.

We have been talking about the peripheries of Persia, but there remains central to this section of al-Ṭabarānī’s History the Persian and Mesopotamian core of the Sasanid empire. The populations and resources of these territories, the firm social structure, the cohesive power within society of the Zoroastrian state church and its ethos, the richness of the irrigated lands of the Sawād of Iraq and the oases of the Iranian plateau, all these provided the motive power for Sasanid expansionism and military success. For nearly four centuries there was a perceptible trend of Sasanid military success over the Romans/Byzantines: in the great battleground of Upper Mesopotamia, the Persian captured Nisibis in 363 and held it continuously thereafter as a bastion of Persian power threatening the Greeks, with the supreme success of final breakthrough in 614. Recently, James Howard-Johnston has perceptively weighed up the comparative positions and roles of the two great empires of the Near and Middle East, concluding that it was above all the Persians' possession of Mesopotamia, with its populousness, its advanced, irrigated agriculture and its position at the head of the Persian Gulf with trade routes stretching thither from the East—all these advantages complementing the results of a similar exploitation of the oasis economies of the Iranian plateau—which gradually gave the Sasanids the edge over Byzantium, enabling inter alia the emperors to use the threat of renewed military action to impose humiliating, tribute-paying conditions on the Greeks.¹

Unfortunately, our knowledge of whole stretches of Sasanid internal history and of the mechanisms driving the empire remains very imperfect. Such basic topics as the nature of the social structure and the roles of the aristocracy, gentry, priesthood, and merchants, and the nature of the landholding and financial system on which the state apparatus rested, continue to excite discussion and controversy among scholars. Sources of information like that from the rich corpus of Sasanid royal and priestly inscriptions and reliefs, the testimony of coins and sealings, the material concerning subordinate faiths of the empire such as that from the conciliar acts of the Nestorian Church and from the Babylonian Talmud, have all been carefully sifted, but cannot compensate for the almost total absence of contemporary records and literature in Middle Persian; and the exact dating and provenance of such exiguous material as we do have, like the Letter of Tansar (see on this p. 17 n. 66, below) continue to be debated. Hence the continued, central importance of al-Tabari's historical information on Sasanid history, supplemented by equally valuable if scantier information in writers like Ibn Qutaybah, al-Ya'qūbī, al-Dīnawarī, al-Masʿūdī, and Ḥamzah al-Īṣfahānī.

It is undeniably true, as Howard-Johnston has again observed, that the version of Sasanid history that reached al-Ṭabarî from one or other versions of the Khwadīy-nāmag or Book of Kings, probably from that translated into Arabic by the late Umayyad writer Ibn al-Muqaffa', almost certainly involved much distortion, suppression, and invention. The penchant for entertaining anecdotes, memorable sayings, curiosa, moralizing tales, and the like, which seem to go back to the Book of Kings's Pahlavi original, was characteristic also of early Arabic udabā' or littératoeurs. In his endeavor to produce a plausible, straightforward historical narrative, al-Ṭabarî must have tried valiantly to cut his way through a mass of entertaining but historically irrelevant information presented to him in these royal annals, but he could not entirely break free of the adab tradition (cf. his inclusion of the totally unhistorical story of Shābūr II's wandering disguised in the Roman camp and capture, p. 60 below, and the tale of Kawād I's escape from imprisonment at the end of the interregnum of Jāmāsp's rule, p. 135 below). Al-Ṭabarî's efforts at pruning less relevant material can be seen in the shortened Persian translation produced by Abū 'Ali Bal'amī (see on this, below), in which the Sāmānid vizier put back in his narrative certain items from the Sasanid historical tradition where he thought al-Ṭabarî had pruned it overzealously. The fact that anecdotal material of the examples given above remained in al-Ṭabarî's History detracts only a little from confidence in his search for sober history.

There is nevertheless a certain unevenness of treatment, perhaps inevitable considering the material within al-Ṭabarî's hands. Sometimes confirmation or amplification of incidents in al-Ṭabarî's narrative can be found in, for example, the Greek, Syriac, or Armenian sources, but when the internal history of the Sasanid empire did not impinge upon or affect the Christians of Persia, there was little reason for Eastern Christian sources to notice events there. Hence we are left with many blank or little-known periods in Sasanid history, such as the reigns of Bahrām II in the later third century (covering seventeen years), of Bahrām IV at the end of the fourth century (eleven years) and of Yazdagird II in the mid fifth century (almost two decades), skated over by al-Ṭabarî [see pp. 46, 69, 106–109 below]. For a crucial subject like Khusraw Anūsharwân’s financial, tenurial, and military reforms, vital for our understanding of the internal dynamics of the later Sasanid empire, we are still largely dependent on al-Ṭabarî’s account; it is detailed and informative, but capable of varying interpretation, and hence has not surprisingly attracted a substantial body of comment and interpretation [see p. 258 n. 624, below]. The same applies to the slightly earlier episode of Mazdak and his religiosocial movement in the reign of Kawâd I and the earlier part of Anūsharwân’s reign, which has given rise to widely varying interpretations, often not unconnected with the political and social views of the scholars concerned [see p. 132 n. 342, below].

2. Ibid., 170–72.

We must be grateful to al-Ṭabarî for preserving as much as he did of hard historical material, among the less valuable episodes of his History that were meant more for entertainment than instruction. Writing a history of the Sasanids without the Arabic chronicles, even though these last date from two or three centuries after the empire’s demise, would be a daunting task.

II

The achievement of Theodor Nöldeke (1836–1930) in producing in 1878 his Geschichte der Perser und Araber zur Zeit der Sasaniden and its stupendous commentary, was uniformly praised on its publication (save for one petulant French reviewer, although one recalls that this was only seven years after the French loss of Alsace-Lorraine to the German empire and that Nöldeke was at that moment sitting in Alsace in a professorial chair at Strassburg/Strasbourg University). In his extended review article of the work, Alfred von Gutschmid stated that Nöldeke’s utilization of al-Ṭabarî had made it possible for the first time to write a real history of the Sasanîds.3 Succeeding generations of scholars—and not only orientalists but those from other disciplines like Byzantine studies—have continued to use Nöldeke’s work and will doubtless continue to do so, when so much of the material he brought to bear on the elucidation and amplification of the Arabic text, that from the Greek, Latin, Syriac, Hebrew, Georgian, and Armenian sources (the latter via his Berlin colleague von Gutschmid), remains still valid. Nöldeke himself regarded his translation as perhaps his chef d'oeuvre. Nevertheless, a plethora of new information has emerged in the intervening 120 years, and this needs to be integrated with any new translation of the Arabic text. Today we live in an age of many specialists but not of polymaths like Nöldeke. How can any single person nowadays—not least the present ‘abd ħaqīr—attempt to gather up and integrate all this new information? Thus as noted above, since Nöldeke’s time, a whole new field within Semitic studies, that of Epigraphic South Arabian and South Arabian history, has emerged and matured. The obvious answer to the problem would be a team of experts collaborating on the project of a translation plus a commentary that would almost certainly exceed by many times the length of the translation itself. Such projects are easy to conceive but hard to finance and even harder to realize. The final volume of the History of al-Ṭabarī project cannot wait a further twenty years or so, which is what such a team of experts in different fields might well require (though Nöldeke finished his translation in one year!); and their finished product would almost inevitably be outdated in many respects before the end of the period of time involved. Hence the present work is offered now for readers’ consideration as one which had to be completed within a period of two years only. The present translator and commentator is conscious of whole areas of new scholarship which should, in ideal conditions, be brought into consideration for the commentary; for instance, much exciting and relevant work is coming out of the Workshops on Late Antiquity and Early Islam, and this has been only partially tapped. But a halt must be called at some point, and I have reluctantly arrived at this; whether the achievement is worthwhile, the reader must judge for himself.

---

4. His view here was expressed in a letter to Goldziher, cited by F. Rosenthal, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation. I. General Introduction and From the Creation to the Flood, 144 n. 469.
The generations of Arabists who have used Nöldeke's Geschichte cannot have failed to be impressed by the degree of accuracy which he achieved in his translation.⁵ Where, as with so much of pre-Islamic poetry, replete as it is with recondite allusions, often totally unrecoverable today, doubt and uncertainty remained, he noted this. Since he actually published the translation a year before the appearance of the edited text (volume 1 of the Prima Series) on which it was based, a more complete understanding of the text led him on occasion to revise his translation (see, e.g., p. 65 n. 177 below). But such occasions were few and far between. What has happened since Nöldeke's time is that several Arabic texts that he had to use in manuscript, such as Ibn Qutaybah's Uyun al-akhbār, al-Ya'qūbī's Ta'rīkh, al-Dīnawarī's Al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, and various poetical dīwāns, have now been critically edited, and wherever possible, I have taken advantage of improved readings in these editions.

When the project for an edition of the History was first mooted in the early 1870s under the stimulus of the Leiden Arabist M. J. de Goeje,⁶ Nöldeke undertook to edit the section on the Sasanids (Prima series, 813–1067) and, after the unexpected death of Otto Loth, the ensuing section 1067–1572; that is, up to almost the end of the events of A.H. 6. Basically, Nöldeke had at his disposal for the section on the Sasanids the three manuscripts (1) L = Leiden 497, covering the whole period except for a lacuna at 878¹²–899¹⁷; (2) C = Constantinople/Istanbul, Köprülű 1040; and (3) T and t = Tübingen Ma. VI, 2 (Wetzstein Collection), with two parts, the second copied later than the first. Other manuscripts in part supplemented these, including P = Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, ancien fonds 627 (a manuscript cognate with L), from 899¹² (i.e., soon after the beginning of the reign of Khusraw I Anūsharwān); and BM = British Library, Add. 23,263, from 915⁹ (i.e., in the section on the Tubba' king of Yemen As'ad Abū Karīb). Nöldeke also mentioned that he had found useful Ibn Hīshām’s version of Ibn

---

Ishaq's Sirat al-nabi (available in the printed edition of 1858–60 by F. Wüstenfeld); the anonymous history contained in the manuscript Sprenger 30 (in the collection acquired in 1858 from Sprenger by the Prussian State Library in Berlin, and still unpublished; it corresponds to one of the two main versions used by al-Ṭabarî for the history of the Sāsānids; see on the work the dissertation of J. G. Rothstein, De chronographo arabo anonymo, qui codice Berolinensi Sprengriano tricesimo continetur); and the Gotha manuscript 24–25 of Bal'ami's abbreviated, and in places slightly amplified, Persian translation of al-Ṭabarî's History (H. Zotenberg's French translation was not published until 1867–74). The Cairo 1960–69 text of al-Ṭabarî's History by the veteran Egyptian editor Muhammad Abû al-Faḍl Ibrāhîm, which incorporates some readings from Istanbul Topkapi Saray manuscripts and certain other ones, has been compared by the present translator with the Leiden text; the additional information gleaned has, however, proved negligible.

The rendering of Arabic names and terms follows the usual system of The History of al-Ṭabarî. In regard to Epigraphic South Arabian, I have endeavored to follow the generally acknowledged system as exemplified in A. F. L. Beeston's Sabaic Grammar. It is the rendering of pre-Islamic Iranian names and terms that causes difficulties, and no watertight system seems possible here. At the suggestion of Mr F. C. de Blois, for the spelling of Middle Persian words and names I have endeavored to follow the principles laid down by D. N. MacKenzie in his A Concise Pahlavi Dictionary (cf. his exposition of the ambiguities and difficulties involved in handling the Pahlavi script, Introduction, pp. x–xv) and now generally accepted by specialists; namely, a strict distinction between transliteration of the consonantal script and transcription of the reconstructed Sāsānîd pronunciation. For example, the name of the first Sāsānîd ruler is transliterated 'rthstr but transcribed as Ardaḵšir. His father’s name is transliterated p'pky but transcribed as Pâbag. Ardaḵšir’s son’s name is spelled etymologically as shp-whły (for šāh + puhr), and the contemporary Sāsānîd pronunciation was Šābuhr, as we know from the Manichaean Middle Persian spelling š'bwhr; although in the commentary to al-Ṭabari's History I have used the later Middle Persian (and early New Persian) form for this last name of Shābor, as being closer to the Arabic version of the name. A further slight anomaly is that I have used the later form Ardashir rather than the strictly correct, earlier form Ardakhshir, as again reflecting early New Persian usage and as being also the familiar Arabic equivalent.

---

Such institutions as the John Rylands University Library, Manchester; the Widener Library, Harvard University; and the Oriental Institute Library, Oxford, have aided completion of the work. Several colleagues have been helpful in making books available to me, providing xeroxes of articles difficult of access to me, sending offprints of their own articles, and giving information and guidance on various obscure or contested points. Thus I am grateful to Mr. Mohsen Ashtiany (Columbia University); Dr. S. P. Brock (Oxford University); Dr. Paul M. Cobb (Wake Forest University, N.C.); the Rev. Professor J. A. Emerton (Cambridge University); Dr. G. Greatrex (University of Wales, Cardiff); Dr. R. G. Hoyland (Oxford University); Dr. Ph. Huyse (Paris); Mr. M. C. A Macdonald (Oxford); Prof. D. N. MacKenzie (Anglesey); Dr. M. I. Mochiri (Paris); Professor Chr. Robin (CNRS, Aix-en-Provence); Professor N. Sims-Williams (SOAS, London); Professor G. Rex Smith (Manchester University); and Professor Edward Ullendorff (Oxford). My colleague in Manchester, Professor W. C. Brice, has drawn the maps in an expert fashion. In particular, Mr. F. C. de Blois (Royal Asiatic Society, London), with his special expertise in such fields as Iranian, South Arabian, and Syriac studies, has been kind enough to read through a draft of the commentary and to make a considerable number of corrections and valuable suggestions for improvement; some of these are explicitly acknowledged in the commentary, but there are many other, unacknowledged places where he has saved me from error or has enriched the documentation. Hence I am deeply grateful to him. But at the end, the usual confession must be made: responsibility for the final product remains my own.

C. Edmund Bosworth
Table 1. The Sasanid Emperors
(the dates of some of the early rulers are tentative)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Ardashir I, son of Pabag</th>
<th>(224 or 226–242)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Shabur I, Sabur al-Junud</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hormizd Ardashir</td>
<td>(270–71)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bahrām I</td>
<td>(271–74)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Narseh</td>
<td>(292–302)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bahrām II</td>
<td>(274–91)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hormizd II</td>
<td>(302–309)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bahrām III</td>
<td>(292)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Ardashir II</td>
<td>(379–83)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Shabur II, Dhū al-Aktāf</td>
<td>(309–79)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Shabur III</td>
<td>(383–88)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bahrām IV</td>
<td>(388–99)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Yazdagird I</td>
<td>(399–430)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bahrām V Gūr</td>
<td>(420–38)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Yazdagird II</td>
<td>(438–57)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table 2. The Roman and Byzantine Emperors, from Constantine the Great to Heraclius

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Emperor</th>
<th>Reign</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Constantine I</td>
<td>324–37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Constantius II</td>
<td>337–61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Julian</td>
<td>351–63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Julian</td>
<td>363–64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Valens</td>
<td>364–78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Theodosius I</td>
<td>379–95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arcadius</td>
<td>395–408</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Theodosius II</td>
<td>408–50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marcian</td>
<td>450–57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo I</td>
<td>457–74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo II</td>
<td>474</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zeno, first reign</td>
<td>474–75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basiliscus</td>
<td>475–76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zeno, second reign</td>
<td>476–91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anastasius I</td>
<td>491–518</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justin I</td>
<td>518–27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justinian I</td>
<td>527–65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justin II</td>
<td>565–78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tiberius II Constantine</td>
<td>578–82</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maurice</td>
<td>582–602</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Phocas</td>
<td>602–10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heraclius</td>
<td>610–41</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table 3. The Lakhmid Rulers
(many dates are tentative)

| 'Adi
| Imru' al-Qays I al-Bad', "King of all the Arabs"
  | (d. 328)
| 'Amr I
| Imru' al-Qays II
  | [ruled for 25 years, died in the early fifth century]
| al-Nu'man I
  | [ca. 400–ca. 418]
| al-Mundhir I
  | [ca. 418–ca. 462]

  | al-Aswad
  | [ca. 462–ca. 482]
  | al-Mundhir II
    | [482–89]
  | al-Nu'man II
    | [499–503]

| al-Mundhir III m. Hind, daughter of al-Harith (Arethas) of Ghassan
  | [ca. 504–54]

| 'Amr II [b. Hind]
  | [554–69]
  | Qâbûs
    | [569 or 570–573 or 574]
  | al-Mundhir IV
    | [ca. 575–80]
  | al-Nu'man III
    | [580–602]
  | al-Mundhir, al-Gharûr
    | [d. 633 or thereafter]
Table 4. The Chiefs of Kindah

Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār b. al-Ḥārith (fifth century)

\[\begin{array}{c}
\text{Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār b. al-Ḥārith (fifth century)} \\
\text{Ḥujr} & \text{Salamah} & \text{Shur̩bīl} & \text{Ma’dī Karib} \\
\text{'Amr al-Maqṣūr (in Najd)} & \text{Mu’awiya al-Jawn (in Yamāmah)} & & \\ \text{al-Ḥārith} & & & \\
\text{(ca. 498–528)} & & & \\
\text{Ḥujr} & \text{Salamah} & \text{Shur̩bīl} & \text{Ma’dī Karib} \\
\text{Imru’ al-Qays (d. ca. 550)} & \text{'Amr Qays Yazīd} & & \\ \end{array}\]
Table 5. Rulers in South Arabia during the Sixth and Early Seventh Centuries

many dates are tentative

Marthad-ilān Yanūf, to end of 518 or beginning of 519

Ma'dī Karīb Ya'fur, last Tubba' king, began ruling end of 518 or beginning of 519

Yūsuf (or Yanūf ?) As'ār Yath'ar, called Dhū Nuwās, 521 or 522, died 525

Abraham, king under Abyssinian suzerainty, killed after 525

Sumu-yafa' Ašwa' (Esimiphaios), king under Abyssinian suzerainty 530 or 531

Abrahah, former slave, ruler ca. 533 till after 553 or 555, nominally on behalf of the king of Abyssinia

Yaksūm, son of Abrahah

Masrūq, son of Abrahah

Sayf b. Dhī Yazan, local Yemeni noble, rebel against Abyssinian domination 570, placed on the throne by the Persian commander Wahriz

Wahriz, governor on behalf of the king of Persia till ca. 575

Marzūbān, his son

Binajān (?), Marzūbān's son

Khurrah Khusrāh, Binajān's son

Bādhān, till ca. 630

Shahr, his son, killed in 632 by the Yemeni local rebel and religious leader al-Aswād or Dhū al-Khimār al-Muhājrī b. Abī Umayyah al-Makhzūmī, first Muslim governor 632

Map 2. The Roman-Byzantine and Persian Frontierlands
Map 3. The Northeastern Frontier of the Sasanids Map 4. The Arabian Peninsula: The Lands of the Lakhmids, Kindah, etc.
Map 5. Southwestern Arabia

- Kindah
- Hadramawt
- Sab'a
- Saba
- Himyar
- Tihama
- Red Sea
- Arabia
- Ethiopia
- Bab al-Mandab
- Hadramawt
- Shibam
- Shibah
- Shabwah
- Ma'rib
- San'a
- al-Ma'in
- Mada'in
- Eudaimon
- Arabian Sea
The kings of the Persians and the duration of their rule according to the entire course of [their] history, since we have already mentioned the major events that took place in the time of the Party Kings (Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if)\(^1\) among the Persians, the Children of

---

\(^1\) Al-Ṭabarī intends by this term, as he has earlier explained (I, 706), the Parthians or Arsacids, considered as regional powers in comparison with such universal monarchs as the Achaemenid emperors of Persia and Alexander the Great. The Sāsānids themselves regarded the "Party Kings," comprising the Arsacids' predecessors the Seleucids (in fact, little known in Iranian historical tradition) and the Arsacids themselves, as an interruption in the development through the ages, from legendary times onward, of the legitimate, unified Persian monarchy, even though the Arsacids ruled for the very respectable span of 474 years. But historical mention of the Achaemenids in indigenous Persian sources seems to be exiguous, beyond some knowledge of the last kings, the Dārās (Darius III being the only monarch mentioned, e.g., in Zoroastrian sources like the Dēnkard and the Bundahīšn, and in Firdawsi's Shāh-nāmah) (M. A. Dandamayev and V. G. Lukonin, however, have suggested that, in the Sāsānid national consciousness, these two Darius were in any case attached to the Kayanids; see their The Culture and Social Institutions of Ancient Iran, 372–73). The problem has exercised modern scholars, who have tended to draw the conclusion that the Sāsānids had little or no knowledge of the Achaemenids, hence could not in any significant way have considered themselves as heirs of the Achaemenids. The arguments have been set forth and discussed, with a wealth of pertinent information, by Ehsan Yarshater in his "Were the Sasanians Heirs to the Achaemenids?" 517–39, and his "Iranian National History," 378; and cf. A. Christensen, Les Kayanides, 35–43. Subsequent Iranian historical scholarship has overwhelmingly endorsed Yarshater's view; see, e.g., G. Gnoli, The Idea of Iran, 136–38; J. Wiesehöfer, Die 'dunklen Jahrhunderte' des Persis, 19; and idem, Ancient Persia from 550 B.C. to 650 A.D., 167–69. Only Touraj Daryaee has recently challenged this consensus, assembling references to the Israel, the Romans (al-Rūm), and the Arabs, up to the time of Ardashīr.2

[Ardashīr I]

When there had elapsed, according to what the Christians and the possessors of the early Scriptures relate, 523 years, but according to the Zoroastrians (al-Majūs), 266 years, since Alexander had taken control of the land of Babylon,3 there arose Ardashīr,4 son of Bābak Shāh, King of Khīr, son of the younger Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of M.h.r.m.s, son of Sāsān, son of Achaemenids from earlier Sasanid sources, citing the veneration by the Sāsānids of Persepolis as a sacred site [but they regarded it as stemming from legendary or semilegendary times!] and suggesting that non-Persian authors such as Greek, Armenian, Jewish, and Muslim ones [including, of these last, the Khwarazmian al-Birūnī in his al-Āṯār al-bāqiyyah] were well aware of the Achaemenids; see his “National History or Keyanid History? The Nature of Sasanid Zoroastrian Historiography,” 129-41. Nevertheless, as emphasized above, the weight of opinion concurs in the view that the Sasanids did not regard themselves as heirs to the Achaemenids, but to the Kayānids.

3. The chronology attributed by al-Ṭabari to the Christians here, and elsewhere, as the “Years of Alexander,” is based on the Seleucid era, that commemorating Seleucus I’s assumption of power at Babylon, commonly fixed at 1 October 312 B.C. The Byzantine historian Agathias dated the beginning of Ardashīr’s reign to the year 538 of the era of Alexander, i.e., A.D. 226-27, probably with Ardashīr’s coronation at Ctesiphon in mind (cf. Averil Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 117). Interpretation of the bilingual, i.e., Parthian and Middle Persian, inscription at Bishāpūr would seem to point to the “official” beginning of the Sasanid dynasty’s rule as being in the calendar year 27 September 223 to 25 September 224; but the topic remains uncertain and controversial. Since Alexander’s era was considered to have begun with his accession, the traditional figure for the length of his reign, fourteen years [e.g., in al-Ṭabari, I, 702, citing “the Persians”], these years had to be subtracted from the known figure of 537 years to give 524 years as the interval separating Ardashīr from Alexander’s death. The lesser figure of the Magians or Zoroastrians given here reflects Sasanid ideological considerations, foreshortening the actual 474 years of Parthian rule in an attempt to depreciate the duration of their predecessors’ power (in reality, this had been longer than the rule of the Sasanids was to extend). See Th. Nöldeke, trans. 1 n. 1; Elr s.v. Arsacids. V. The Arsacid Era, and VI. Arsacid Chronology in Traditional History (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

4. MP ‘r.t.h.š.t.r, pronounced Ardaxšīr, from a hypocoristic form *Rtaxšīra of the full OG form *Rtaxšātra, i.e., Artaxerxes. The name had apparently continued in use among local princes of Fārs during the Arsacid period, on numismatic evidence. See Nöldeke, trans. 1 n. 2; D. Sellwood, “Minor States in Southern Iran,” 304-305; Elr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (J. Wiesehöfer).
King Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb, son of Luhrāsb, son of Kaywaji (?), son of Kaymanush. According to another genealogy, [he was] Ardashīr, son of Bābak, son of Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of Zarār, son of Bihā-Afrīdh, son of the elder Sāsān, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb, son of Luhrāsb.5 [He arose] in Fārs seeking, as he alleged, to avenge the blood of his paternal cousin Dārā, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, on whom Alexander had made war and had killed two of the latter's chief commanders. As he said, he wished to recover the royal power (or: the kingdom) for its rightful holders and for those who had held it continuously in the previous time of his predecessors and forefathers, before the “Party Kings,” and [wished] to gather it together again under one head and one monarch.6

It is mentioned that he was born in a village (qaryāh) of the Ištākhür region called Tirūdīh, situated in the rural district (rustāq)

---

5. On the problems in the Sāsānīd genealogies, see G. Morrison, “The Sassanian Genealogy in Mas’ūdi,” 42–44; R. N. Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 207–208; idem, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians.” 116–17. The genealogies go back to personages like Zarār and Bihā-Afrīdh who were attached (nonhistorically) to the Arsacids, and then back to the legendary Kayāṇīs, the Achaemenīds having by Sāsānīd times (apart from the Dariuses) receded into a legendary haze. See Nöldeke, trans. 2, nn. 1–3, 3 n. 1.

The question of the nearer descent of Ardashīr, whether Sāsān was actually his grandfather or a more remote ancestor (the jadd of al-Ṭabarī’s text could imply either of these), or directly connected with the line of Pābag at all, has aroused considerable discussion, since the sources, literary and epigraphic, offer differing interpretations. Thus, noting the description of Sāsān as a lord but with no explicit filiation of Pābag as the son of Sāsān in the Ka’ba-yi Zarduhaft inscription at Naqsh-i Rustam, R. N. Frye is inclined to believe that Sāsān was a remote ancestor whose name was used for the dynasty as a whole, just as the Achaemenīds took their name from the totally obscure Haxāmānīs/Achaemenēs, while noting the epic tradition that, since Sāsān died just after his son Ardashīr’s birth, the boy was adopted, following current Zoroastrian practice, as Pābag’s own son. The popular Persian tradition, exemplified in the Middle Persian romance, the Kār-nāmag-ī Ardašīr-ī Pābagān, pace the view expressed here by al-Ṭabarī, makes Ardashīr the son of Sāsān, the local ruler Pābag having given his daughter in marriage to Sāsān after hearing of the latter’s noble descent from Dārā, i.e., the last Achaemenīd Darius III (considered by the Sāsānīds as the last Kayāṇīd king). See the discussions in R. N. Frye, “History and Sasanian Inscriptions,” 215–16; idem, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 116–17; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (Wieschöfer).

6. Again reflecting Sāsānīd imperial propaganda that Ardashīr restored the unity of the state as the heir of earlier, pre-Arsacid rulers whom he now avenged on Artabanus V.
of Khīr\(^7\) in the administrative division (\(kūrah\)) of Iṣṭakhr.\(^8\) His grandfather Sāsān was a courageous and mighty warrior whose courage and military might were such that he fought single-handed eighty of the strong and valiant men of Iṣṭakhr and put them all to flight. His wife stemmed from one of the royal families in Fārs called the Bāzrājīn.\(^9\) She was named Šarābhish, and possessed beauty and perfection. Sāsān was the custodian of the fire temple of Iṣṭakhr called that of Anāhīd.\(^10\) He was also a devotee of the chase and of equestrian pursuits (\(al-fūrūsiyyah\)).

7. This town of Fārs (other forms such as Khayr and Khīyār are found in the geographers) lay near the southeastern tip of Lake Bakhtīgān in the district of Ni‘rīz, and marked a stage on the Shirāz–Kīrmān road. See G. Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, 289–90; P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 104–105. The location of Tirūdīh, and the exact form of its name, remain unclear.

8. In Sāsānid times, Stakhr (thus written in Pahlavi script, stxdr) was regarded as both the religious and political center for the dynasty, given the origins of the Sāsānids themselves from the district. It lay on the Pulvar river north of Persepolis, and may have come into prominence after Alexander the Great’s destructions at Persepolis. In Islamic times, it remained moderately significant as the center of the \(kūrah\) or administrative district [see on this term n. 119 below] of the same name but was gradually overshadowed by the foundation in early Umayyad times of Shirāz, which became the capital for the whole of Fārs. See Nöldeke, trans. 3 n. 2; Le Strange, Lands, 275–76; Schwarz, Iran, 13–16; W. Barthold, An Historical Geography of Iran, 151–53; \(EP\), s.v. Iṣṭakhr (M. Streck-G. C. Miles); \(Elr\), s.v. Eštakr (A. D. H. Bivar and Mary Boyce), This tradition identifying Tirūdīh as Ardashīr’s birthplace may well deserve credence; before the Sāsānids, the Arsacids had continued to venerate their original home in northeastern Persia, on the evidence of Isidore of Charax.

9. The correct form of this name is unclear. Nöldeke, trans. 4 n. 1, compared it with a mountainous district of western Fārs, Bāzrāng, mentioned by the Islamic geographers al-Ishtakhri and Ibn Ḥawql [see Le Strange, Lands, 171–72; Schwarz, Iran, 118–19], so that we might possibly have a family name derived from a place. The Bāzrāngis were apparently a family of local potentates in Fārs, acknowledging the Arsacids as their suzerains but in practice largely autonomous; after the time of Ardashīr, however, they disappear from historical record. See Elr, s.v. Bāzrāngi (R. N. Frye). Whether Ardashīr really was related to one of these families cannot now be ascertained, but such a link is by no means improbable; A. von Gutschmid, “Bemerkungen zu Tabari’s Sasanidengeschichte, übersetzt von Th. Nöldeke,” 734, was less skeptical than Nöldeke about such a possibility.

10. The Avestan Aradvi Sūra Anāhīta “mighty, immaculate one of the waters,” a goddess of fertility, nurturer of crops and herds, and also of success in battle, MP Ardwisūr Anāhīt, had also become identified with the Western Iranian Anāhīti, apparently the goddess of the planet Venus. Venerated by the Achaemenids from the time of Artaxerxes II onward, the cult was popular among the early Sāsānids, and Shāpūr I called his daughter and queen Ādūr Anāhīt, “Fire [and] Anāhīt,” i.e., this was a dvandva name, from the names of two deities. According to al-Tabarī’s source, presumably the Khwadāy-nāmag or “Book of Kings,” Ardashīr was now laying claim to custodianship of the fire temple that had grown out of a shrine to Rāmbihisht provided Sāsān with a son, Bābak, whose hair, at the moment he was born, was already over a span long. When he reached the age of sound judgment, he assumed rule over the people after his father. Then his son Ardashir was born to him. The ruler of Iṣṭakhr at that time was a man from the Bāzranjīn family called, according to what I have been told from information going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad [i.e., Ibn al-Kalbi], Jūzhir, Anāḥīd, the beginning of a tradition among the Sāsānids that their founder had been at once warrior hero, prince, and priest. See Nödeke, trans. 4 n. 2; EIr, s.v. Anāḥīd. i. Ardwīsūr Anāḥīd [M. Boyce].

Anāḥīd, i. Ardwīsūr Anāḥīd [M. Boyce].

11. A legendary touch, like being born with a full set of teeth, presaging future strength and greatness. See Nödeke, trans. 4, n. 3.

12. The major early Islamic historian of pre-Islamic Arabia, including Yemen and the fringes of the northern and central Arabian Desert facing the empires of the Byzantines and the Sāsānids, and also a prime authority, as his magnum opus the Jamharat al-nasab shows, on Arab tribal genealogy and history, born in Kūfah ca. 120/737 and died there in 204/819 or 205/821. His interest in pre-Islamic Arabian history seems to have arisen partly from a desire to elucidate the background of the Qurān, and partly from his Kalb family origins, for the Kalb had played a glorious role in South Arabian tribal history as the mainstay of the Qua'īah, and then in early Islamic times had been the principal military backing for the Umayyad caliphs in Syria. Moreover, his home town of al-Kūfah lay close to al-Ḥirah, in pre-Islamic times the capital of the Lakhmids, and also a prime authority, as his magnum opus the Jamharat al-nasab shows, on Arab tribal genealogy and history, born in Kūfah ca. 120/737 and died there in 204/819 or 205/821. His interest in pre-Islamic Arabian history seems to have arisen partly from a desire to elucidate the background of the Qurān, and partly from his Kalb family origins, for the Kalb had played a glorious role in South Arabian tribal history as the mainstay of the Qua'īah, and then in early Islamic times had been the principal military backing for the Umayyad caliphs in Syria. Moreover, his home town of al-Kūfah lay close to al-Ḥirah, in pre-Islamic times the capital of the Lakhmids, whose history Hishām was especially concerned to elucidate [see, e.g., al-Ṭabarī, I, 821–22, pp. 20–22 below]. His interest here was such that he called one of his sons al-Mundhir, the name so typical of Lakhmids that they are often referred to as al-Manādhir, and thus himself acquired the kunyah or patronymic of Abu al-Mundhir. This interest in the Lakhmids further gave him a desire to make available to his contemporaries in early 'Abbasid Iraq the history of the Lakhmids' suzerains, the rulers of Persia. This explains why Hishām provided so much material for al-Ṭabarī on the Persian monarchs (which al-Ṭabarī, being himself of Iranian stock, was probably not averse from using); he wrote a special monograph, no longer extant, on the Parthian Arsacids, the Kitāb Mulūk al-tawā'if. This material on the Lakhmids and Sāsānids is much greater in quantity and richer in caliber than the exiguous material al-Ṭabarī could find on the Ghassānids of Syria and their suzerains the Byzantines. Apart from his careful use of written sources, including historical traditions and narratives, akhbār, derived from his father Muhammad, a noted Qurānic scholar and exegete, Hishām apparently had access to some written documents on the Lakhmids still available in al-Ḥirah during his own lifetime. He combed local churches and monasteries for their inscriptions and for documents preserved there. He was especially familiar with the verses of the poet of the last Lakhmids at al-Ḥirah, 'Adī b. Zayd (see n. 116 below), but must have had the whole corpus of pre-Islamic poetry and that of the interval between the Jahiliyyah and the new Islamic dispensation, the mukhadram, at his fingertips.

and, according to others, Juzhir. This last had a eunuch called Tirâ,14 whom he had appointed castellan *(arjabadh)*15 of Dârabjird.16 When Ardashîr reached the age of seven years, his father took him to Juzhir, whose seat was at al-Baydâ,17 made his son stand before Juzhir, and asked the latter if he would attach the boy to Tirâ as a foster child of his and as the future castellan in Tirâ’s stead. Juzhir agreed to his request and had the terms of the request written out for him in a formal sealed document *(sijill).*18 Bâbak

---

and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 349–66; EP, s.v. al-Kalb (W. Ataullah).

13. Older forms Göchîthr, Göchîhir, rendered in Greek sources as Gōsîthrés “a former king of the Persians.” It means “whose seed is cattle,” i.e., parent of the cattle, gaośćithra being used in the Avesta as an epithet of the moon. See Nöeldeke, Iranisches Namenbuch, 110. No coins from Göchîhir [or from any other Bâzrânjîs] are extant, but his historical existence seems likely.

14. This name stems from such a compound name as Tir-dâd “given, created by Tîr or Mercury.” In Greek sources a king of Characene is named as Tiraios [from whom coins are known], and it may have been this ruler who gave his name to the Nahr Tirâ or Tirin river or canal of early Islamic Al-Ahwâz (Yâqût, Mu‘jam al-buldan, V, 319; Le Strange, Lands, 241; Schwarz, Iran, 308, 313–15). See Nöeldeke, Iranisches Namenbuch, 4 n. 5; Justi, Namenbuch, 325, 326–27; P. Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides en moyen-perse épigraphique, no. 899.

15. Nöeldeke, Iranisches Namenbuch, 5 n. 1, took (h)argabadh to mean “castellan,” but the coexistence of the specific Middle Persian term dizbed, meaning “commander of a fortress,” led some scholars subsequently to doubt this interpretation and suggest a meaning like “tax collector” for an MP hargbed. However, Christensen, L’Iran sous les Sassanides, 107, noted that, at the outset of the Sassanid state, it was an office held by the prince Ardashîr I [see al-Tabari, I, 415, p. 7 below], and in EL, s.v. Argbed, M.-L. Chaumont opts for the former meaning, “commander of an arg,” to use the NP term corresponding to MP argbed. Both readings of the word are possible. It clearly became a very prestigious office, and later, al-Tabari, I, 869, p. 104 below, states that it was close in status to that of the commander-in-chief of the army.

17. Literally, “the white [fortress, town, etc.]”, a town of Fârs lying to the north of Shirâz and in the Kâmfirûz district. This region flourished as far back as Elamite times as that of Anshan [see EL, s.v. Anshan [J. Hansman]], but al-Baydâ is today little more than a village. See Yâqût, Buldân, I, 529; Le Strange, Lands, 280; Schwarz, Iran, 16–17, 54; Barthold, Historical Geography, 153, 161; EP, s.v. al-Baydâ’ [O. Løfgren], EL, s.v. Bayzâ [C. E. Bosworth].

18. Derived from Latin sigillum “seal” and then in Late Latin and Byzantine Greek usage applied to the document or scroll to which a seal had been affixed, this term came into Arabic certainly by Qur’ânic times (cf. Sûrah XXI, 104). It later acquired various technical legal and administrative senses. See EP, s.v. Sidjill. 1. Qur’ânic and early Arabic usage (F. C. de Blois).
took him along to Tīrā, who received him handsomely and adopted him as his own son. When Tīrā died, Ardāshir took over his office, and performed the function admirably. A group of astrologers and diviners informed him that he had been born under an auspicious star and that he would rule the lands (sc., the whole of Iran). It is related that, after this, Ardāshir behaved in a modest and unpretentious manner in pursuance of this forecast, and continued each day to grow in good deeds and conduct, and that he saw in a dream an angel sitting by his head who told him that God was going to give him rulership over the lands, so he was to prepare for this. When he awoke, he rejoiced at this and felt within himself power and great strength such as he had never before known.

The first thing he did was to proceed to a place in the Dārābjīrd district called Jūbānān,19 and killed a ruler there named Pāsin.20 Then he went along to a place called Kūn.s (?i) and killed a ruler there called Manūshihr,21 and after that to a place called L. īr.wīr (?i),22 where he killed a ruler there named Dārā.23 In all these places he appointed persons [as governors] responsible to him. He then wrote to his father (sc., to Bābak) telling him what he had accomplished, and called upon him to rise up against Juzhir, who

19. Literally, “cowherds,” MP *gōbānān, in this form or the singular Jūbān, is the name of several villages in Persia, cf. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 176 (Jūbānān), IV, 487 (Kūbānān), but most probably here is meant what was in early Islamic times the town of Jūbānān on the northern shore of Lake Bakhtīgān (now, it seems, vanished from the map) and on the Ḩīṣākh-r-Sīrājān-Kīrmān road. See Nöldeke, trans. 6 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 278-79; Schwarz, Iran, 109.

20. Thus the reading of the ms. Sprenger 30, an anonymous chronographical work (see Introductio, p. LII), i.e., Pisūn, Pasūn, a name familiar in the Iranian national legend, see Justi, Namenbuch, 252-53, but other mss. have readings that could be Wās.īr (see text, n. g), cf. Wāsībūr, etc.

21. This name of a hero in the Iranian national legend (literally, “from the race of Maṇu,” in Indian legend, the first man; see Yarshater, “Iranian National History,” 433-35, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 559) is attested on pre-Sāsānian coins, or on coins roughly contemporary with the advent of Ardāshir to power, issued by kings of Persis. See Nöldeke, trans. p. 6 n. 6.

22. Both Kūn.s and Lurwīr are unidentified.

23. This ancient name of Achaemenid kings had survived among local rulers during the Arsacid period, and one of these may have been the eponymous founder of Dārābīrd (according to the Middle Persian geography used by J. Markwart, ed. G. Messina, in his A Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals of Erānshahr, 19, by a Dārā, son of Dārāl, since names of towns composed of a personal name and the ending -gird do not occur before the time of Alexander the Great. See Nöldeke, trans. 6 n. 7.
was at al-Bayḍā'; this Bābak did, killing him and seizing his crown,24 and then he wrote to Ardawān the Pahlawi, king of the mountain regions (al-Jibāl, i.e., Media) and the adjoining lands,25 humbly entreating and requesting from him permission to place upon his son Sābūr's head the crown of Juzhir. Ardawān, however, wrote back to him in harsh terms informing him that he and his son Ardashīr were to be regarded as rebels, since the two of them had killed people; but Bābak took no notice of this.

Bābak died around that time, and Sābūr, son of Bābak, was invested with the crown and reigned in his father's place as king.26 He wrote to Ardashīr instructing him to proceed to his court, but Ardashīr held back. Accordingly, Sābūr grew angry at Ardashīr's recalcitrance; he gathered together troops and set off at the head of them to make war on Ardashīr. He left Išṭakhr and encamped in the building (binā') of Khumāy27 on the road to Dārābjird, but part of the building fell on top of him and killed him. When news of this reached Ardashīr, he proceeded to Išṭakhr.28 He found there a number of his brothers, some of them older than himself. They

24. The account transmitted by al-Ṭabarī seems to magnify Ardashīr's role in the fighting against Artaβanus; it may well have been Bābak and not his son who took the initiative here. See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 1.

25. That is, the last Arsacid king, Artaβanus IV (in the older reckoning, Artaβanus V), r. ca. 213–ca. 224. The Greek form Artaβanus, Parthian and MP Artaβanān, represents OP *Artaβānu “the glory of Arta” [i.e., the divine order of the Avesta, cf. Elr s.v. Ardwahist [M. Boyce]]. See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 2; A. D. H. Bivar, “The Political History of Iran under the Arsacids,” 94–96, 99; Elr, s.v. Artaβanus [M.R. Dundamev, K. Schippmann]. The form Artaβanān was taken over by the Arab historians; see the citations detailed in al-Masūdi, Murūj al-dhahab, ed. Ch. Pellat, VI, Index généraux, 137.

26. The name Shābūr, MP Shāhpuhr, “son of the king,” ultimately going back to OP *Xšāyathiya.pūthra, was not apparently used before the Sāsānids (see Justi, Namenbuch, 284–87; Gignoux, Les noms propres sassanides, no. 858). Whether Shābūr was thus named by his father to buttress his right to succeed to the throne is uncertain. His reign was long enough for him to mint coins. In any case, Ardaβshīr's theoretical role as a usurper was subsequently validated by his succession on Shābūr's accidental death. See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 3; Elr, s.v. Ardaβshīr I. i. History [Wiesehöfer].

27. Humāy, Avestan Humāyān, is in the Avesta the daughter of Wishtāspa, playing a role in later Persian epic tradition somewhat like that of the Assyrian queen Semiramis. Early Islamic authors such as al-Dinawarī, al-Masūdi, and Ḥamza al-Iṣfahānī attribute to Humāy the building of palaces in the vicinity of Išṭakhr, in one of which Shābūr now met his death, possibly in an earthquake. See Nöldeke, trans. 8 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 131–32; M. Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 177.

28. These words are supplied from the ms. Sprenger 30.
nevertheless gathered together and brought in the crown and the royal throne, and then offered them all to Ardashir. Hence he was crowned and sat down on the throne.

He began his reign with vigorous and incisive measures. He appointed various persons to diverse offices, and nominated a man called Abarsām to the position of Chief Minister (buzurg framadhār), lavishing largesse on him and giving him numerous charges. He appointed a man named Fāhr (?) as Chief Mūbadh (mūbadhān mūbadh). He got wind of a plot on the part of his brothers and some other persons in his entourage to assassinate him, hence he slew a great number of them. Then news came to him that the people of Dārābjird had risen against him, so he returned thither and conquered the town after killing a number of its citizens. He proceeded to Kirmān, where there was a king called Balāsh. There was a fiercely fought battle, in which Ar-

---

29. Abarsām is a fully historical figure, attested as a high-ranking official of Ardashir's in Shābūr I's Naqsh-i Rustam inscription, in which the latter monarch lists those court dignitaries in whose memory Shābūr had set up a pious foundation. He could not have been the chief minister, since this official for both Ardashir and Shābūr is named as a Babag, and his exact rank and title are uncertain, but he was obviously exalted enough for the late Sāsānid tradition, as transmitted by al-Ṭabarī, to consider him as chief minister. See EIr, s.v. Abarsām [E. Yarshater]. For Abarsām's supposed part in the preservation and then production at an opportune moment of the prince Shābūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 823–25, pp. 24–27 below.

It is, however, an anachronism of al-Ṭabarī's source that he introduces already the office of buzurg framadhār, which is not attested till the early fifth century [see on the office, n. 257 below]. Court and administration cannot have been so neatly organized at this early time; the highest offices under the Sāsānids in their first century of power were actually those of the (ḥ)argbed [see above, n. 15] and the bidakhsh, a kind of viceroy, cf. EIr, s.v. Bidax [W. Sundermann]. See Nöldeke, trans. 9 n. 2, and on the name Abarsam, Justi, Namenbuch, 1, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 14.

30. This renders MP mowbed mowbedān “supreme priest,” in Syriac the rēš maghūšī; see Nöldeke, trans. 451, Excursus 3. The title comes into usage comparatively late in the Sāsānid period and is not an early one. As Nöldeke remarks, trans. 9 n. 3, the new ruler, whether from personal conviction or for reasons of state, showed himself eager to establish the Zoroastrian clergy in a leading role under his dynasty.

31. This, or Walāsh, is the NP form of MP Wardākhsh, well known in the Greek forms Vologesos, etc., and it was a frequent name for the Arsacid kings, later appearing also in the Sāsānid royal line in the shape of Balāsh, son of Yazdajird II [484–88], see, p. 126 below. This Balāsh of Kirmān must have been a local ruler of the last Arsacids, and he may have been the founder of the town of Walāshgird, on the road connecting Jiruf with Hurmuz, mentioned by the Islamic geographers [Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 383; Le Strange, Lands, 317–18; Schwarz, Iran, 248]. See dashīr took part personally, until he captured Balāsh and seized control of the city. Ardashīr thereupon appointed as governor over Kirmān one of his sons, also called Ardashīr.

Ruling in the coastlands along the Persian Gulf was a king called 'b.t.n.b.w.d (Haftānbūkht ?), who was accorded divine attributes and worship. Ardashīr marched against him, killed him by cutting him in half with his sword, put to death the members of his entourage, and brought forth from their subterranean store rooms (matāmīr) extensive treasures that had been piled up there. He wrote to Mihrak, the king of Abarsās (?) in the district of Ardashīr Khurrah, and to a group of his fellow rulers, summoning them to his obedience. When they refused to submit, he

---

Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 2; Elr, s.v. Balāš [M. L. Chaumont].

In Sāsānīd times and in early Islamic times up to the fourth/tenth century, the shahr-i Kirmān, the provincial capital, was what became the early Islamic city of Sirjān, in the western part of the province and near the modern Saʿīdābād. It may have been this first Sāsānīd governor, Ardashīr, son of Ardashīr I, who laid out what was perhaps a military encampment, rather than a city, at Weh Ardashīr in the northeastern part of the province (Ḥamzah al-Ịṣfahānī, Taʿrīkh, 43), the place that became in later times Guwāshīr or Bardāsir, provincial capital under the Büyids and, afterward, became the modern city of Kirmān. See Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 300–301; J. Marquart, Erdnsahr nach der Geographie des Ps. Moses Xorenac'ī, 30; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 90; Barthold, Historical Geography, 137–38, s.v. Kirmān [A. K. S. Lambton].

32. Thus according to text, n. b. Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 1 renders the reading 's.w.w.d of the Sprenger ms. as Astawadh (?). The spelling Haftānbūkht (?) is probably a misrendering of an Achaemenid term for an administrative district, denoting a component part of a province, a term that survived through Islamic times as the modern place-name Haftūwan, a village to the southwest of Khunj, in the western part of Lāristān, in southern Fārs.

33. Sing. matmūrah, meaning a subterranean chamber, either natural or man-made, used essentially for the storage of foodstuffs like grain (i.e., as a silo) or, as here, for treasure. The plural form is not infrequently a toponym in early Islamic times, as in Byzantine Asia Minor, see al-Ṭabarī, III, 1104, year 216/831–32, and in general, EP, s.v. Matmūra (Ch. Pellat).

34. Thus in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 382, but regarded by Nöldeke as dubious; the mss. have various incomprehensible readings, see text, n. d. For Mihrag, older form Mithrak, see Justi, Namenbuch, 207–208; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 629.

35. One of the five kūrahs or administrative districts making up the province of Fārs, in which was later situated the Islamic provincial capital Shirāz. The kūrah's MP name, "Ardashīr's glory," commemorated the founder of the Sāsānīd dynasty, while the original town there of Gür, the Islamic Jūr and then Firūzābād, was said to have been built on the site of Ardashīr's decisive victory over the last Arsacid Ardawān or Ardabanus IV in ca. A.D. 224. See Nöldeke, trans. 11 n. 2, 446 Excursus 3; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 283; Le Strange, Lands, 248–49; Schwarz, Iran, 43ff.; Barthold, Historical Geography, 152–53, 158–59; EP, s.v. Firūzābād [L. Lockhart].
proceeded against them and killed Mihrak. He then went to Jūr; he founded the city [there] and began the construction of the palace called al-Ṭirbāl and also of a fire temple.

While he was engaged in these activities, an envoy from Arдавān (Azdawān, Lāzdawān ?) arrived bearing a letter from the latter. Hence Ardashīr assembled the leading men in the state (al-nās) for this purpose and read out the document in their presence. The contents were as follows: “You have presumed beyond your rank in society, and have brought down on yourself destruction, O Kurd brought up amongst the tents of the Kurds Who gave you leave to assume the crown on your head, and permission to seize all the territories you have assembled together and whose rulers and peoples you have subdued? Who ordered you to build the city which you have founded in the desert of . . . ?”—he meant Jūr—“When we allow you to go ahead and construct it, then build a city in the desert which is ten farsakhs across and call it Rām Ardashīr!” He went on to inform Ardashīr that he had dispatched the king of al-Ahwāz against him, with orders to bring back Ardashīr to him in bonds. Ardashīr replied, “It is God who has bestowed on me the crown which I have assumed, who has given me authority over the lands which I have conquered, and who has aided me against the mighty potentates (jabābirah) and kings whom I have slain. As for the city which I am to build and which I am to name Rām Ardashīr, I very much hope to get my hands on you and then send your head and your

36. This appears in the Arabic dictionaries, defined as “high building, tower” (see E. W. Lane, Lexicon, 1836c), but must in reality be a loanword from MP talwār “audience hall,” a synonym of iwān. There are impressive remains above ground of Ardashīr’s palace at Gūr/Jūr; see Elr, s.v. Architecture. iii. Sasanian (D. Huff), at II, 331 (Plate V), 332. Concerning the fire temple at Jūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1067, p. 410 below.

37. Nöldeke, text, n. e, preferred the reading of the Sprenger ms. Lāzdawān.

38. Here, as often in premodern Islamic history in all times and places, al-nās does not mean “people in general” but “the people who matter, the people”; cf. the Mamlūk awlād al-nās, sons of amirs and mamlūks within the ǧālqah unit of the Mamlūk army; i.e., sons of the ruling military caste.

39. A looking-forward to later Islamic times when, certainly from the ‘Abbāsīd period onward, kurd, “shepherd, nomad,” is virtually a synonym for “robber, bandit, brigand.”

40. See for Jūr, n. 35 above.

41. Literally, “joy of Ardashīr.” Ardashīr’s words here are of course ironic: you may plan a city, but you won’t be able to carry out the plan! See Nöldeke, trans. 12 n. 3.
treasuries to the fire temple which I have founded at Ardashir Khurrah.

Then Ardashir headed toward Ištakhr, and left Abarsam [as governor] in Ardashir Khurrah. Not much time had elapsed before a letter reached him from Abarsam with the news that the king of al-Ahwāz had appeared but that he had retreated after being defeated in battle. Whereupon Ardashir proceeded to Ištahān, took its king Shādh Sabūr prisoner and then killed him, after which he returned to Fārs, and went forth to give battle to Nirūfarr (?), ruler of al-Ahwāz, marching to Arrajān, Sanbīl (?), and Tāshān, dependencies of [the district of] Rām Hurmuz, and then to Surraq. When he reached these places, he rode on with a group of his retainers until he stood on the banks of the Dujayl (here, the Karon river), took control of the city [already existing there], and founded the [new] city of Sūq al-Ahwāz; then he returned to Fārs.

42. Again ironically, Ardashir asserts that he has no need of a new city, but will adorn his existing one with his enemy's head. See Nöldeke, tr. 12 n. 5.
43. This ruler would be the ruler of Elymais, a vassal of the last Arsacids, the region of southeastern Khūzistān, with its center at the modern Tang-i Sarvak; coins are extant from these petty rulers.
44. Ardashir is now for the first time moving out of Fārs against neighboring potentates. Nothing is known of the rulers in Ištahān at this time; Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 1, surmised that Shādh Sabūr, literally "joy of Sabūr," should perhaps be read as Shāh Sabūr, since the name in the text would be more fittingly that of a town.
45. The name of a city and of the westernmost kūrah of Fārs, adjacent to the border with the province of Aḥwāz. Al-Ṭabarī's mention of it here would be anachronistic in the light of the information in many Arabic authors that it was founded by the emperor Qubādh (I) (i.e., some two-and-a-half centuries after Ardashir's time), but clearly an older town existed on the site, which Qubādh may have rebuilt. See Yāqūt, Buldān, 1, 142–44; Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 2; Le Strange, Lands, 248, 268–69; Schwarz, Iran, 111ff.; Barthold, Historical Geography, 164–65; H. Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arrāgān/Kūh-Gilüyeh, 28–31, 74–76; EP, s.v. Arrājān (M. Streck-D. N. Wilber); Elr, s.v. Arrajān [H. Gaube].
46. Nöldeke's preferred reading, n.c, for the text's s.sār.
47. Tāshān or Ṭāsān probably survives today as the ruined site of Tāshhūn. See Schwarz, Iran, 344; Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arrāgān/Kūh-Gilüyeh, 112.
48. The region of which Dawraq [al-Furs] was the chief town. See Le Strange, Lands, 242; Schwarz, Iran, 370–71; Sir Arnold T. Wilson, The Persian Gulf. An Historical Sketch from the Earliest Times to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century, 186–87; Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arrāgān/Kūh-Gilüyeh, 22ff.; EP2, s.v. Dawrak [L. Lockhart]; Elr, s.v. Dawraq [C. E. Bosworth].
50. A city of lower Khūzistān or Aḥwāz (the latter an Arabic broken plural of Hūzī, Khūzī, the name of the Iranian tribe originally occupying the region), the laden with plunder. He set off from Fārs once again, and went back to al-Ahwāz by the road through Jirih and Kāzarūn, \(^{51}\) and then from al-Ahwāz to Maysān, where he killed a ruler there called B.n.dū (?) and built there Karkh Maysān. \(^{52}\)

Yet again, he set off back to Fārs, and dispatched a message to Ardawān demanding [that he name] a place where the two of them could fight together. Ardawān replied that he would meet Ardashir on a plain called Hurmuzjān \(^{53}\) at the end of the month of Mihr. Ardashir, however, reached the place before the appointed time in order to take up a [favorable] position on the plain. He dug out a ditch to protect himself and his army, and took possession of a spring there. \(^{54}\) Ardawān came up against him, and the troops deployed themselves in battle order. Sābūr, Ardashir’s son, had name Ahwāz also being applied to the province’s capital, further defined as the province’s “market” (ṣūq), given the agricultural and commercial prosperity of the province. There was probably an Achaemenid settlement on the site of Suq Ahwāz, which Ardashir rebuilt and refounded as his own city, Hurmuz Ardashir (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 820, p. 16 below), and in Sāsānīd times it prospered greatly as the capital of the province of Susiana after the decay of Susa. See Yaqūt, Buldān, I, 284–86; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34; Schwarz, Iran, 315–24; EIr, s.v. al-Ahwāz [L. Lockhart]; EIr, s.v. Ahvāz. 1. History [C. E. Bosworth].

51. These two places, often mentioned together by the geographers, lay to the southwest and west, respectively, of Shirāz. See Yaqūt, Buldān, II, 131, IV, 429–30; Le Strange, Lands, 266–68; Schwarz, Iran, 33, 35; Barthold, Historical Geography, 163–65; EIr, s.v. Kāzarūn (J. Calmard).

52. The Greek Mesēnē, MP Mēshān, Arabic Maysān, was the region along the lowest reaches of the Tigris in Mesopotamia to the east of the Baṭīḥa, or Great Swamp. Its center was the Seleucid foundation of Charax Spasīnou, with the province in Arsacid times being known as Characene, with the subsequent Syriac name Karkhā ḏō Mēshān (karkhā, “fortified town”), eventually yielding the Arabic form given by al-Ṭabarī. Ardashir conquered Characene in ca. 224, but there seems to be no confirmatory evidence that the rebuilt and refounded town of Charax acquired the name As(ar)ābād Ardashīr. See Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 5; PW, III/2, s.v. Charax, Mesēnē (Weissbach); Le Strange, Lands, 43, 80; Marquart, Erānšahr, 40–42; M. J. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 155–61; W. Eilers, “Iran and Mesopotamia,” 487; Bosworth, “Iran and the Arabs before Islam,” 594; EIr, s.v. Maysān (M. Streck–M. Morony); EIr, s.v. Characene and Charax (J. Hansman).

53. Unattested in the Islamic geographers... See Nöldeke, trans. 14 n. 1, the name appears in al-Dinawāri’s al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl with an intrusive d, i.e., Hurmuzjīdān.

54. The exact location of the battlefield is unknown. It has been fixed as probably somewhere near the later Islamic town of Gulpāyagān to the northwest of Iṣfahān; the date of the battle was 30 Mihr of Seleucid era 535/28 April 224. See EIr, s.v. Artābanus (K. Schippmann), at II, 65c–d. There remains, nevertheless, the possibility that the encounter took place in eastern Khūzistān if the name Hurmuzjīdān should have some connection with the town of Rām–Hurmuz; the terrain there would certainly be suitable for extensive cavalry maneuvering.
already gone forward in order to shield his father. Fierce fighting got under way, in the course of which Sābūr killed Dādhbundādh,\textsuperscript{55} Ardawān's secretary (sc., the writer of the letter) with his own hand. Ardashir rushed forward from his battle position toward Ardawān and killed him. There was great slaughter among Ardawān's troops, and the survivors fled the field. It is said that Ardashir dismounted and trampled Ardawān's head with his feet. On that day of battle, Ardashir received the title of "Supreme King" (Shāhānshāh, literally "King of Kings").\textsuperscript{56}

Then he went from there to Hamadhān and conquered it by force of arms, as also the mountain region (al-Jabal), Azerbaijan, Armenia, and [the region of] al-Mawsīl. The he went from al-Mawsīl to Sūristān, that is, the Sawād,\textsuperscript{57} and took possession of it for himself. On the banks of the Tigris, opposite the city of Ctesiphon (which is the city that forms the eastern part of al-

\textsuperscript{55} The rendering preferred by Nöldeke, text n. a, for the dār.n.b.dādh of the text [Sprenger ms., dād.b.n.dār].

\textsuperscript{56} Ardashir commemorated his victory in a rock relief, the largest surviving Sāsānid one, on a mountainside near his town of Ardashir Khurrah. See Efr, s.v. Ardašīr I. ii. Rock reliefs [H. Luschey] (with illustrations).

Ardashir's symbolic investiture with the ancient title of "King of Kings" is depicted in a relief at Naqsh-i Rustam, in which the king receives the diadem of sovereignty from Ahura Mazdā, and in other reliefs depicting god and king at the bridge near Ardashir-Khurrah and at Naqsh-i Rajab. See Georgina Herrmann, \textit{The Iranian Revival}, 82–88, 90 [illustration]; Luschey, loc. cit. [with illustrations]. His assumption of the title is also noted in the other Arabic sources on the Sāsānids: al-Yaqūbī, \textit{Tārīkh}, I, 179; al-Dinawari, \textit{al-Akhbār al-fiwāl}, 43; al-Masʿūdī, \textit{Murnj}, II, 161 = §585. It was from the date of his victory over Ardawān [see above, n. 54], i.e., the regnal year 223–24, or at his formal accession to the throne shortly afterwards (probably therefore at some point between 224 and 226, see Frye, "The Political History of Iran," 118–19, and n. 68 below) that Ardashir dated the beginning of his reign, which extended till his death, most probably in 242 [the chronology of the early Sāsānids is in many places uncertain]. See Nöldeke, trans. 15 n. 1; the genealogical table of Sāsānid rulers in Frye, \textit{The Heritage of Persia}, 295 [in which several dates for the early Sāsānids need correction], and his list in "The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians," 178 [again with some early dates to be corrected]; Efr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History [J. Wiesehöfer].

\textsuperscript{57} Nöldeke, trans. 15 n. 3, took Sūristān to be a Persian translation of Bēth Aramāyē, "land of the Syrians." It could also denote "the region of the Nahr Sūrā," this being the name the Arabs gave to what was then the eastern branch of the middle Euphrates [now the river's main channel; see Yāqūt, \textit{Buldān}, III, 279; Le Strange, \textit{Lands}, 70; Marquart, \textit{Erānsahr}, 21; Markwart-Messina, \textit{Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals}, 103]. It is equated with the Sawād, "the dark lands" (contrasted, in its vegetation and greenery, with the dazzling whiteness of the surrounding desert), the irrigated region of Mesopotamia. See EP, s.v. Sawād [C. E. Bosworth].
Madā‘in), he built a city on the western side, which he called Bih Ardashir. He formed this into a province [kūrah], adding to it Bihrasīr, al-Rūmaqān, Nahr Darqīt, Kūthā and Nahr Jawbar,58 and appointed local governors [‘ummāl] over them. Then he went back from the Sawād to Iṣṭakhr, and thence to Sījistān, thence to Jurjān, and thence to Abarshahr;59 Marw, Balkh, and Khwārazm, as far as the farthest frontiers of Khurāsān, after which he returned to Marw. He killed a large number of people, and despatched their heads to the fire temple of Anāhīdh. Then he returned from Marw to Fārs and took up his quarters at Jūr. Envoys from the kings of the Kushan, of Turan, and of Makran, came to him offering their submission.60 From Jūr, Ardashir went to al-Balirayn and laid siege to its king Sanatruq. The latter was reduced to the extremity of need, till finally he threw himself down from the walls of the citadel and perished. Ardashir returned to al-Madā‘in and estab-

58. For these places, see Nöldeke, trans. 16 nn. 3, 4; Le Strange, Lands, 34, 68-70; Marquart, Erānsahr, 164-65; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 143ff. As Nöldeke observed, tr. 16 n. 4, these administrative arrangements reflect late Sasanid administrative geography, not that of Ardashir's time, shown by the inclusion of Rūmaqān, the settlement of Weh-Andiyog-Khusraw, founded by Anūsharwān for the people of Antioch carried off after the Persian conquest of that city in 540, and called in Arabic al-Rumiyyah. See Fry, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 155; EIr, s.v. "Deportations. ii. In the Parthian and Sasanian Periods" (E. Kettenhofen), at VII, 301a; pp. 157-58 below.

59. That is, the region around Nishāpūr, the central part of Khurāsān, the province to which Ardashir turned his attention once he had secured western Persia. The name Abarshahr probably reflected an old Aparn-šāthra "country of the Aparnak," Greek Aparnai, the leading tribe of the Dahae who founded the Parthian empire. For the city of Nishāpūr and its foundation, see n. 163 below. See Yaqūt, Buldan, I, 65-66; Nöldeke, trans. 17 n. 2, 59 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 382-88; Marquart, Erānsahr, 36, 74-75 (his rendering of Abarshahr as "upper country" is to be rejected); Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 52-53; Barthold, Historical Geography, 94ff.; EIP, s.v. Nishāpūr (E. Honigmann-C. E. Bosworth).

60. These potentates were neighbors of the Sāsānids in what is now northern Afghanistan and the Sījistān-Baluchistan region. The demise of the Kushan empire, which had in its heyday straddled the Hindu Kush and extended over northern India, seems to have taken place ca. 225, and is probably to be connected with Ardashir's campaigns against the Kushan Shāh, laconically referred to here. See Nöldeke, tr. 17 n. 5; Bivar, "The History of Eastern Iran," 203. Türān was in early Islamic times a region of east-central Baluchistan associated with Qusdār or Khuzdār, i.e., it lay to the north of the coastal region of Makrān and, as Nöldeke observed, trans. 18 n. 1, is not to be confused with Türān, the name the Iranians gave to the peoples beyond the Oxus. The Paikuli inscriptions of some two generations after Ardashir's time mention the Makurān Shāh as a vassal of the Sāsānids but not the Türān Shāh. See EIP, s.v. Türān (V. Minorsky).
lished himself there, and he had his son Shābūr crowned within his own lifetime.61

It is related that there was in a village called Alār, in the district of Kūjarān, which is one of the rural districts of the coastland of Ardashīr Khurrah, a queen who was accorded the respect and worship of a divinity and who possessed wealth, treasuries, and soldiers. Ardashīr made war on her priestly custodians (sadanah), killed her, and seized as booty immense wealth and treasures belonging to her. [It is further related] that he built eight cities: in Fārs, the city of Ardashīr Khurrah, that is, Jūr, the city of Rām Ardashīr, and the city of Riw Ardashīr,62 in al-Ahwāz, Hurmuz Ardashīr, that is, Sūq al-Ahwāz; in the Sawād, Bih Ardashīr, that is, the western side of al-Madāʿin,63 and Astābād Ardashīr, that is, Karkh Maysān; in al-Baḥrayn, Fasā (?) Ardashīr, i.e. the city of al-Khaṭṭ;64 and in [the region of] al-Mawsīl, Būd Ardashīr, that is, Ḥazzah.65

61. These movements by Ardashīr mark the beginning of Sāsānīd attempts to control the western shores of the Gulf, and we now have the start of a Persian political, cultural, and religious penetration into eastern Arabia that was to continue until the advent there of Islam in the 630s. The appearance of the Parthian name Sanatrūq/Sinatrices, so common among the Arsacids and their dependents in Adiabene and Commagene, may mean that this local ruler in Baḥrayn was an Arsacid vassal. See Nöldeke, trans. 18 n. 3; A. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter im klassischen Arabisch, 77–79; Bosworth, “Iran and the Arabs before Islam,” 603–604.

The coronation of Shābūr with his father’s crown and the joint rule of father and son is confirmed by Ardashīr’s late coins, which, inter alia, depict Ardashīr and a youthful king symbolizing the son, and also by rock reliefs, including one at Dārābgīrd apparently depicting Shābūr, victorious over the Romans, and wearing his father’s crown. See Elr, s.v. Dārāb. iii. Rock Reliefs (Georgina Herrmann).

62. This name later became Rēshahr/Rīshahr. Its modern ruins lie at the southern end of the Bushire peninsula; the name survived at least until the sixteenth century in that of the Portuguese fort of “Reixer.” See Nöldeke, trans. 19 n. 4; Schwarz, Iran, 120–21; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 73–74; Barthold, Historical Geography, 164; EI2, s.v. Būshahr (Būshir) [L. Lockhart].

64. Al-Khaṭṭ was a term applied by early Islamic historians and geographers to the coastlands of eastern Arabia from the head of the Persian Gulf down to Oman, without any more precise definition. The particular settlement of al-Khaṭṭ was said to be held by the `Abd al-Qays tribe and to be an entrepôt for a famous type of spear, the Khattī, imported from India and sold to the Bedouins, but it is impossible to locate it firmly. The name would appear to be old and to be connected with the Chatenia of the classical geographers. See Nöldeke, tr. 20 n. 3; PW, III/2, s.v. Chattenia [D. H. Müller]; Bosworth, “Iran and the Arabs before Islam,” 593–4; EI2, s.v. al-Khaṭṭ [A. Grohmann].

65. Ḥazzah, marked today by an entirely Muslim village Heza to the southwest
It is mentioned that, when Ardashîr first came to power, he wrote to the Party Kings eloquently phrased letters setting forth his rightful claim to authority over them and summoning them to obedience. When he came to the end of his life, he set forth his testament for his successor. All through his career he was the object of praise and was victorious in war. No military force of his was ever put to flight nor was any banner of his ever hurled down.

of Irbil, was the administrative center of a region of the same name in Adiabene, the region between the Greater and the Lesser Zab rivers in northern Mesopotamia (see on it, Elr, s.v. Adiabene [D. Sellwood]). The town is frequently mentioned in Nestorian Christian literature as the seat of a bishopric in the metropolitansate of Irbil (and ca. 1200 a Jacobite bishopric is mentioned there). Ibn Hawqal in the fourth/tenth century still speaks of the arq HaZZah and its component rustags. See Nöeldeke, tr. 20 n. 4; M. Canard, Histoire des H'amdanides, 123; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, 1, 165–67; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 132–33. Hamzah al-İsfahiî devotes much of his section on Ardashîr in Ta'rikh, 43-44, to the many cities the emperor founded and his many fire temples and other buildings. Although a zealous adherent of Zoroastrianism, Ardashîr seems to have been tolerant of the Christian communities within his realm, although it was only toward 250 that what might be called a catholic Christianity, with a defined dogma, evolved with a proper ecclesiastical hierarchy, at least as far as the Tigris. See J. Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide, 224–632, 10-17; M.-L. Chaumont, "Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l'Empire iranien au IIIe siècle de notre ère," 167–68.

66. This is a reference to what was in Islamic times known as the 'ahd Ardashîr, in fact a good example of the "Mirrors for Princes" genre, listed by Ibn al-Nadîm in his Fihrîst, 377–78, trans. Bayard Dodge, The Fihrîst of al-Nadîm. A Tenth-Century Survey of Muslim Culture, II, 740, as the Kitâb 'Ahd Ardashîr Babakân ilâ ibnîhi Sâbîr and described as a translation from Pahlavi. Whether any material from the time of Ardashîr is actually contained in it is unknown, but it is more likely that material ostensibly from Ardashîr was imputed to him later. The text and a translation of it, at that time still in manuscript, were given by Mario Grignaschi in his "Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d’Istanbul," 46–90, and the work has been subsequently edited and published by Ihsân 'Abbâs, 'Ahd Ardashîr, Beirut 1967. A related text is the A'în-i Ardashîr, a collection of aphorisms and advice on statecraft, also edited and translated by Grignaschi in op. cit., 91–133. Also relevant here is mention of the so-called Letter of Tansar, known subsequently to the Islamic world through an Arabic translation, probably by Ibn al-Muqaffa' from a lost Pahlavi original, but now known substantially in a New Persian version. It purports to be the work of Ardashîr's Chief Priest, Tössâr or Tansar; it adjures a local prince of Tabaristan to submit to the Sâsânîd ruler and, in general, justifies Sâsânîd rule and political conduct. Although it is generally accepted that the Letter in its existing form dates substantially from the time of Khusrav Anûsharwân, i.e., the sixth century, it may well have a core going back to the third century. See EF, s.v. Tansar, Kitâb [F. C. de Blois]. See also for a recent consideration of all three of these texts as part of the movement for translating works from the Pahlavi into Arabic, and their place in the subsequent development of Islamic political and social thinking, Louise Marlow, Hierarchy and Egalitarianism in Islamic Thought, 72–88.
He reduced to submission and humiliated all the rulers of the lands around his own kingdom, and conquered the lands totally. He divided up the land into provinces, laid out cities, established the various ranks and offices in the state, and exerted himself in multiplying the fertility and flourishing of the land. His reign lasted, from the time when he killed Ardawān till he himself perished, fourteen years, but according to others, fourteen years and ten months.

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad (i.e., Ibn al-Kalbī) that states: Ardashīr moved for-

68. Ardashīr I reigned from spring 224, the date his victory over Ardawān took place, or 226 (see n. 56 above) to 240 as sole ruler, and then for two more years till his death as co-ruler with his son Shāpur. There has, in fact, been much discussion about the chronology of Ardashīr’s last years and the exact date of his death; this latter event should probably be placed, in Wiesehöfer’s estimation (see below), in early 242, most likely in February of that year. Ardashīr’s name appears on his coins as ‘ARThSTR. See, on his coins, Furdoonjee D. I. Paruck, Sāsanian Coins, 51–52, 305–16, 413–16, Plates I–III, Table I; R. Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 42, Tables I–la, Plates 1–2; D. Sellwood, P. Whitting, and R. Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 73–78; Hodge Mehdi Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 232–33.

The Arabic sources on the rise of the Sāsānids and Ardashīr’s reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 563–54; al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 179 [very brief]; al-Dinawarī, al-Ākhbār al-tiwāl, 42–45 [Ardashīr’s rise to power and defeat of Ardawān’s son Farrukhān, the extension of his authority over outlying provinces and the story of the clandestine birth and upbringing of his son Sābūr] (II, see below, al-Ṭabarī, I, 833–23); Ḥamzah al-Īṣāfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 42–44 [Ardashīr’s rise and consolidation of power, his new cities and his building operations]; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 148, 151–63 = §§ 573, 576–88 [his defining of the various ranks in the Persian social, military, and religious structures, his emphasis on court ceremonial, his urban foundations and building works, and his aphorisms on statecraft and monarchical power, as set forth in the Kār-nāmag [-i Ardašīr-i Pābagān], on which see n. 5 above]; idem, Tanbih, 98–100, trans. B. Carra de Vaux, Le livre de l’avertissement et de la revision, 141–44; and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 380–84. Among Persian sources, see al-Ṭabarī, Persian abridged trans. Bal’ami, trans. H. Zotenberg, Chronique de Abou-Djafar-Mo’hammed-ben-Djarîr-ben-Yezid Tabari, I, 527–28, II, 66–75.

For studies on the reign of Ardashīr in general, see e.g., Christensen, Sassanides, 86–96; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 207–21; idem, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 118–25, 178; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (J. Wiesehöfer). Nöölske, trans. 21 n. 4, thought that the picture of the first Sāsānīd emperor as an exemplary ruler, while not without some basis, was exaggerated. Ardashīr can nevertheless be accounted a firm and successful ruler who brought unity to the Persian lands after the chaotic conditions of the late Arsacid period. It is probably true that he extirpated the Arsacid royal family within Persia (though not in Armenia, see n. 84 below), but he conciliated and took into his service many of the great Parthian military and administrative families, thus providing some element of continuity within the state.

69. The change to Ibn al-Kalbī’s narrative, with material emanating from the ward at the head of an army of the men of Fārs seeking to gain military and political ascendancy over Iraq. He encountered there Bābā, the king of the Aramaeans, and he also encountered Ardawān, the king of the Ardawānīs. Hishām explains: The Aramaeans are the Nabataeans (al-Anbāṭ) of the Sawād, and the Ardawānīs are the Nabataeans of Syria. He goes on to relate: Each one of these two groups used to fight with each other over the possession of power, but then they came together and agreed to fight Ardashīr. So the two of them fought against Ardashīr, each assisting the other (or: going forth in separate groups, alternately, mutasānidāyīn) one of them would fight one day, and the other would fight on another day. When it was Bābā's day for combat, Ardashīr was unable to withstand him, but when it was Ardawān's day for combat, the latter was unable to withstand Ardashīr. So when Ardashīr realized that, he made a peace agreement with Bābā, on the basis that Bābā would let Ardashīr alone and leave the latter to fight it out with Ardawān, while Ardashīr, for his part, would leave Bābā in control of his own territories and all within them. In this way, Ardashir was free to combat Ardawān alone; he speedily killed him and conquered all his possessions and dependencies. He also compelled Bābā to give obedience [to him]. Thus Ardashir took firm control of the realm of Iraq; its rulers became subject to him, and he finally brought into submission all the people there who had resisted him, thereby compelling them to do what he wished and what was in accordance with his plans, however distasteful though it was to them.

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

[Hishām b. Muḥammad continues:] When Ardashir conquered Iraq and seized power there, a large part of the Tanūkh [group of tribes]73 disliked the prospect of remaining in his kingdom and becoming his subjects. Hence those of them belonging to the tribes of Qudā’ah who had come with Mālik and ‘Amr, the two sons of Fahm, together with Mālik b. Zuhayr and others, went forth and eventually joined with those of Qudā’ah already in Syria.74 Now there was a group of the Arabs who were guilty of committing

73. This important tribal confederation, accounted as South Arabian in genealogy when they were in Iraq, and said to have spread out from the southern part of the Arabian peninsula toward the fringes of Iraq and Syria, was certainly an ancient one, apparently referred to by Ptolemy as the Thanouitai. Their history in the peninsula is very shadowy, but they are attested on the fringes of the Fertile Crescent by the third century A.D. and, as al-Ṭabarī relates, they became a significant population element in al-Ḥīrah and Mesopotamia as “Arabs of the Marches” [i.e., of the Sāsānid empire, ‘Arab al-Ḍāhiyah], and seem to have had some kinship connection with the ruling Lakhmids of al-Ḥīrah. It was in these places that some at least of the Tanūkh acquired Christianity, which they retained well into the Islamic period. See G. Rothstein, Die Dynastie der Lahmiden in al-Ḥīra, 18–40, 134–38; I. Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 360–62, 366ff., 418ff.; E1, s.v. Tanūkh [H. Kindermann], E3, s.v. Tanūkh [I. Shahid], and see the next note.

74. Qudā’ah were an old group of tribes, whose components included Bali, Juhaynah, Kalb, Khawlān, Sāliḥ, Tanūkh, ‘Udhrāh, etc. The genealogists were uncertain whether they belonged to the North or South Arabs; there are indications that, in the Umayyad period, the Qudā’ah of central Syria may have changed their affiliation, for military and political reasons, from Ma’add, the North Arabs, to Qahtān, the South Arabs [see W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 446–53; M. J. Kister and M. Plessner, “Notes on Caskan’s Gamharat annasab,” 56–58; G. R. Hawting, The First Dynasty of Islam, The Umayyad Caliphate A D 661–750, 36]. The Tanūkh of Qudā’ah were certainly installed in northern Syria and northern Jazirah during the eighth and ninth centuries, still Christian in faith and considering themselves Qahtānis. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskan-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, tables 274, 279, II, 73–76, 470; E3, s.v. Qudā’a [M. J. Kister].
various misdeeds among their own people,\textsuperscript{75} or who were becoming reduced by hardship in their daily life to extremities, so that they were moving into the agricultural lands (\textit{rif}) of Iraq and settling at al-\textit{Ḥīrah}.\textsuperscript{76} [The population of al-\textit{Ḥīrah}] thus comprised three elements. The first element was that of the Tanukh, who dwelled in shelters and tents of hair and skins on the western banks of the Euphrates, between al-\textit{Ḥīrah} and al-\textit{Anbār} and beyond.\textsuperscript{77} The second element were the 'Ibad ("devotees"), that is, those who had [originally] settled in al-\textit{Ḥīrah} and built themselves permanent houses there.\textsuperscript{78} The third element were the Aḥlāf \textsuperscript{75} That is, had brought down upon their heads blood feuds. See Nöldeke, trans. 24 n. 1.

\textsuperscript{76} This was the great city, strategically situated on the borderland between the cultivated lands of the Sawād of Mesopotamia and the northeastern fringes of the Arabian Desert; its ruins (first noted by B. Meissner, \textit{Von Babylon nach den Ruinen von Hitra und Hūarnaq}, Deutsche Orientgesellschaft Sonderrichtungen 2, 1899, Leipzig 1901) can be seen today to the southeast of al-\textit{Najaf}. It owed its rise, as the most important city of the Arabs for three centuries, to the Lakhmids and was always closely associated with that dynasty, with a peak of splendor under al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu\textit{mān} II (r. 504–54), the appointee of Qubadh and Khusraw Anūsharwān (see \textit{Ṭabarānī}, I, 899–900, pp. 159, 161 below). The decline of the city came with the end of the Lakhmids, when in 602 Khusraw Abarwēz deposed and killed al-Nu\textit{mān} III b. al-Mundhir IV (see text, I, 1026–28, below) and entrusted the city to Persian nominee governors, and then with the city's surrender in 12/633 to the Muslim general Khalīd b. al-Walid (see \textit{Ṭabarānī}, I, 2019). It continued to exist, however, for at least four more centuries, but was gradually eclipsed by the nearby, newly founded mīr or armed camp of al-Kūfah. See Yaqūt, \textit{Buldān}, II, 328–31; Nöldeke, trans. 25 n. 1; Rothstein, \textit{Lahmiden}, 12–40; Le Strange, \textit{Lands}, 75–76; Siddiqi, \textit{Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter}, 76–77; Elpers, "Iran and Mesopotamia," 487–88; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 597; \textit{EP}, s.v. al-\textit{Ḥīra} (I. Shahid).

The etymology of the name al-\textit{Ḥīrah} has traditionally been connected with Syriac \textit{ḥērātā}, "enclosure," but Shahīd has argued that an etymology from the languages of the Arabian peninsula, with the sense of "military encampment," is more likely, especially since we have in Sabaic \textit{ḥyrτ}, \textit{ḥrτ} = "encampment," and a verb \textit{ḥyr}, "to encamp" [see for these, A. F. L. Beeston et al., \textit{Sabaic Dictionary}, 74; Joan C. Biella, \textit{Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect}, 175]. Shahīd proposes that we should accordingly consider Syriac \textit{ḥērτā} as a loanword from the Arabian peninsula, not vice versa. See his \textit{Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century}, 490–98.

These dwellers in shelters and (permanent?) tents must have represented a transitional way of life between those of the pure nomadic Bedouins and the house-dwelling 'Ibad. See Nöldeke, trans. 24 n. 3.

\textit{Anbār} (Persian, "storehouse," "granary") was an ancient town of central Iraq, at a crossing-point of the Euphrates and further strategically important as the approach from the west to Ctesiphon-al-Madā' in and, later, to Baghdad. Its value had led Shābūr I to rebuild it in early Sāsānīd times and to rename it Firūz-Shāpūr. See Yaqūt, \textit{Buldān}, I, 257–58; \textit{PW}, I/2, s.v. Ambara (F. C. Andreas); Le Strange, \textit{Lands}, 65–66; A. Musil, \textit{The Middle Euphrates}, 353–57; \textit{EP}, s.v. al-Anbār (M. Streck and A. A. Duri); \textit{EIr}, s.v. Anbār (M. Morony).
22 [The Kings of the Persians]

("confederates"), who had joined with the people of al-Hirah and settled among them but who belonged neither to the tent-dwelling Tanūkh nor the 'Ībād, who had both submitted to Ardashir.79

Al-Hirah and al-Anbār were both built in the time of Buḥt Naṣṣar [Nebuchadnezzar], but al-Hirah fell into ruins when its population migrated to al-Anbār at the time of Buḥt Naṣṣar's death. In this way, al-Anbār flourished for 550 years, until al-Hirah revived in the time of 'Amr b. 'Adi, when the latter took up his residence there. Al-Hirah accordingly flourished for 530-odd years, until al-Kūfah was founded and [the people of] Islam took up residence there. The complete extent of 'Amr b. 'Adi's tenure of power was 118 years, of which ninety-five fell within the time of Ardawān and the "Party Kings" and twenty-three years within the time of the Persian kings, comprising fourteen years and ten months of Ardashīr son of Bābak's reign and eight years and two months in his son Sābūr's reign.80

78. The Arab Christian 'Ībād, "devotees," of al-Hirah represented the culturally most advanced Arabs of their time, even though their Lakhmid rulers remained generally pagan, at times fiercely so. The last Lakhmid king, al-Nu'mān III, may have been the first Christian ruler since the time of Imrū' al-Qays I al-Bad' [see al-Ṭabarānī, I, 834, p. 44 below]. Modern archaeological investigations, from an Oxford expedition in 1931 to the work of the Japanese Archaeological Expedition to Iraq in the 1970s and 1980s, have uncovered the sites of many Christian churches both at the site of al-Hirah itself and in the surrounding district; see the details given in Erica C. D. Hunter, "Syriac Inscriptions from al Hira," 66–67, and nn. 2, 4–5; and also J. S. Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 197 and n. 114. Early Arab traditions state that the Arabic alphabet, having evolved among the literate scribes of al-Hirah, was carried thence to the Arabian interior and Mecca [but note the doubts of G. Endress, "Die arabischen Schrift," 169]. Certainly, the Lakhmid kings were great patrons of the Bedouin poets who flocked to their court, but the city itself also produced several noted poets, headed by the celebrated 'Adī b. Zayd [see al-Ṭabarānī, I, 1016–24, pp. 339–51, below, and n. 116, below]. See Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 18–28; Bosworth, Iran and the Arabs before Islam, 597–99; and for al-Hirah as a literary center, R. Blachère's section "La poésie à la cour des Lakhmides de Hira," in his Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 293–301.

79. These must have been Bedouins sedentarized within the city; see Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 18ff., and Bosworth. "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 599. The Lakhmid kings' policy of balancing rival tribal groups within Arabia against each other, one of divide and rule, is discussed in F. McG. Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 45–48.

80. 'Amr b. 'Adi, the father of the Imrū' al-Qays I al-Bad', "king of the Arabs," of the Namārah inscription [as this has customarily been read], lived toward the end of the third century and in the early part of the fourth century, he was regarded as the father of the dynasty, but cannot have ruled for such a span of years. See al-Ṭabarānī, I, 834–35, p. 44 below; Nöldeke, trans. 25 n. 1; Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 50ff.
Mention of the Holders of Power in the Kingdom of Persia after Ardashīr b. Bābak

[Sābūr I, called Sābūr al-Junūd]81

When Ardashīr b. Bābak died, there succeeded to power in Persia82 his son Sābūr. When Ardashīr b. Bābak had attained the royal power, he wrought great slaughter among the Arsacids [al-Ashakāniyyah],83 to whom belonged the “Party Kings,” until he had exterminated them, in accordance with an oath which Sāsān the elder, son of Ardashīr, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, the ancestor of Ardashīr b. Bābak, had sworn: that, if at some point, he should attain the royal power, he would not spare a single one of the progeny of Ashak, son of Khurrah. He had further laid this charge on his descendants, and had instructed them in his testament not to leave alive a single one of the Arsacids if they should succeed to power [immediately after him] or if one of them should [eventually] attain to royal power one day. The first of his descendants and progeny to achieve this power was Ardashīr, son of

---

81. That is, “Sābūr of the Armies.”
82. Here, for the first time in the present text, Fārījūs seems to mean the land of Persia in general rather than the province of Fārs, cradle of ancient Persian monarchy, in particular.
83. The Arabic name for the dynasty goes back to the eponymous founder of the line, Arshaka, Parthian ‘rāk, Greek Arsacēs, who seized power in northern Parthia ca. 247 B.C., henceforth the beginning of the Parthian era. See Nöldeke, trans. 26 n.1; Bivar, “The Political History of Iran under the Arsacids,” 28, 98.
Bābak. Hence Ardashīr massacred the Arsacids en bloc, women and menfolk alike, not sparing a single one of them, in accordance with the intention of his forefather Sāsān.84

It is mentioned that he left no one alive except a maiden whom he had found in the royal palace. He was struck by her beauty, and asked her—she was really the slaughtered king’s daughter—about her origins. She stated that she was the handmaiden of one of the king’s wives. He then asked her whether she was a virgin or had previously been married. She told him that she was a virgin. So he had sexual intercourse with her and took her as one of his concubines, and in due course she became pregnant by him. Now when she became assured of her own safety in regard to him, because of her firm position in his affections through her pregnancy, she informed him that she was really from the progeny of Ashak. However, he recoiled from her, and summoned Harjand, son of Sām,85 a man of great seniority and advanced years, and told him that she was from Ashak’s progeny. Ardashīr went on to say, “It is incumbent upon us to keep faith with our forefather Sāsān’s vow, even though she has become dear to my own heart, as you well know. So take her away and kill her!” The old man went off to kill her. She told him that she was pregnant. He took her along to the midwives, who confirmed that she was indeed pregnant. He consigned her to an underground cellar. Then he cut off his own

84. Whether the Arsacid royal family, the line of Ardawān, was so thoroughly exterminated is hard to determine, but the Arsacid dynasty in Armenia, which had come to power when Tiridates I was crowned king of Armenia by the Roman emperor Nero in A.D. 66, continued to rule there till the early fifth century; the Armenian Arsacids considered themselves the holders of legitimate Iranian rule and, not surprisingly, their relations with the upstart Sāsānīd supplanters of their kinsmen in Persia always remained strongly hostile. See D. M. Lang, “Iran, Armenia and Georgia,” 517–18. Whatever the fate of members of the Arsacid royal house in Persia, many of the great Parthian “feudal” families seem gradually to have made their peace with the Sāsānids and to have entered their service; such was certainly the case with the Kāren, Sūrēn, and Mihrān families. See Nöldeke, trans. 26 n. 1; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 119–20.

85. Perhaps one should read here Abarsām (on Abarsām, see n. 29 above) for the text’s H.r.i.n.d ibn Sām, as in al-Dinawārī, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 43–45, where he is described as Ardashīr’s wazīr. This last historian in fact gives the story of Abarsām’s self-mutilation and the birth of Shāpūr I, the only one of the other Arabic sources on the Sāsānids to note it. See also Nöldeke, trans. 27 n. 2.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

_genitalia and placed them in a box, which he sealed. He returned to the king. The king said to him, “What have you done?” He replied, “I have consigned her to the bowels of he earth,” and he handed over the box to the king, asking him to seal it with his personal seal and to place it in one of his treasuries; this Ardashir did.

The girl remained with the old man until she gave birth to a baby boy. The old man did not want to give the king's son a name inferior to his status, nor did he wish to tell him about his real rank when he was still a child, but only when he was grown up and had completed his education and acquisition of good manners (adab). The old man had actually determined the astral conjunctions at the moment of the boy's birth and had worked out for him his horoscope; he realized from this that the child would eventually become a ruler, hence he gave him a name which would be both a description and also a true personal name, in that he would subsequently have a choice regarding it when he knew all about it (i.e. whether it was intended for him as a descriptive or a personal name). Hence he called him Shāh Būr, which means in Arabic “king's son” (ibn al-malik), and he was the first person to be thus named.86 This was Ardashir's son, Sābūr al-Junūd. Other authorities say, on the other hand, that he called him Ashah Būr, meaning in Arabic “the son of Ashak,” from whose progeny the boy's mother stemmed.

Ardashir passed several years in a childless state. Then the faithful old man, who had the child in his care, went into the king's presence and found him deep in sorrow. He asked him, “What is making you so sad, O King?” Ardashir replied, “Why should I not be sad? Although by means of my sword I have seized everything between the East and the West, although I have conquered everything I wanted and although I have complete control over the kingdom, the kingdom of my forefathers, yet I shall die in the end, leaving no offspring behind to succeed to my authority, and there will be no enduring trace of me within the royal power during the future." But the old man said to him, "May God grant you joy, O King, and give you long life! I have in my care a fine, noble son of yours. Call for the box which I entrusted to you, and which you personally sealed, to be brought in, and I will show you the decisive proof of that." Ardashir sent for the box. He examined the impression of his seal, and then he broke it and opened the box. In it he found the old man's genitalia and a document on which it was written: "When we ascertained that the daughter of Ashak had indeed conceived by the King of Kings Ardashir, at the same time when the latter ordered us to kill her, she being pregnant, we did not consider it lawful to destroy the noble seed of the king. So we consigned her to the bowels of the earth, as our monarch had commanded us, and we exonerated ourselves in his sight from any guilt [i.e., by the self-mutilation], lest any calumniator find any means to forge lies against her. We made it our concern to protect the rightfully sown seed until it should be united once again with its own kindred. This took place at so-and-so time in so-and-so year."

---

86. Conveniently forgetting here Ardashir's prematurely deceased brother Shābūr, see al-Ṭabari, I, 816, p. 8, above, and taking no account of the fact that the future Shābūr (I) must have been born well before the defeat of Ardawān and the overthrow of the Arsacids. See Nöldeke, trans. 28 n. 1.

On hearing all this, Ardashir ordered the old man to place the boy among a group of a hundred youths—according to others, among a thousand youths—all of exactly the same appearance and height as the boy, and then to parade them before him in a body, avoiding any distinguishing features of clothing, height, and demeanor. The old man did this. When Ardashir looked at this group of youths, his instinct immediately recognized his own son out of all the throng, and he found him pleasing, without there having been made any indication of him or muttered hint concerning him to the king. Then he gave commands for them all to be brought into the antechamber of the royal palace (hujrat al-aywān). They were provided with polo sticks, and they set to playing with a ball, the king meanwhile being seated on his throne inside the palace proper (al-aywān). The ball flew into the palace chamber where the king was. All the youths held back from entering the place chamber, but Sābūr pushed his way forward from their midst and went in. Ardashir now deduced from Sābūr’s entry into his pres-

87. Historical romance and legend does in fact describe Ardashir as the first prominent enthusiast for polo, as, e.g., in the Kārnāmag-i Ardāsīr-i Pābugān. See EP, s.v. Čawgān (H. Massé).
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

ence, his thrusting forward and his temerity—all this being in addition to the feeling in his heart for acceptance of Sabur, which he had felt on the first occasion when he saw him, and his tender sentiments toward him, quite lacking in regard to all his comrades—that he was indeed his own son. Ardashir said to him in Persian, “What is your name?” The youth answered, “Shah Bur.” Ardashir exclaimed, “The king’s son (shah būr)!” When he was completely certain that the youth really was his son, he publicly acknowledged him and hailed him as heir after himself.88

The Persian people had already experienced, before the royal power passed to Sabur and during his father’s lifetime, Sabur’s intelligence, virtue, and knowledge, combined with ardor in battle, eloquence, and wit, tenderness toward the subjects, and mildness. When the crown was [eventually] placed on his head (i.e., after his father’s death), he gathered together before him all the great men of state. They then sent up prayers for his long life and went on at length in mentioning his father and the latter’s excellent characteristics. Sabur informed them that they could not have invoked his benevolence by any means more acceptable to him than by what they had said about his father, and he gave them promises of beneficence. Then he gave orders that the riches in the treasuries were to be lavished on the people (al-nās, i.e., the landed and military classes who were the supports of the state), sharing them out among those whom he deemed worthy of receiving them—the prominent persons, the troops, and those [of them] who had fallen into indigence (ahl al-hājah). He wrote to his governors in the provinces and outlying districts that they were to do likewise with the wealth under their control.89 In this way, he distributed his bounty and beneficence to those near and far, noble and humble, the aristocracy and the generality of people, so that all shared in this benevolence and their standard of daily life was thereby raised. Then he chose governors over the populace, and

88. As Nöldeke notes, trans. 30 n. 2, this tale of Ardashir’s recognition of Shabur as his son and his appointing him his heir, is pure fantasy.

89. Nöldeke, trans. 31 n. 7, regarded it as highly unlikely that a powerful monarch like Shabur, who intended vigorously to prosecute the wars with the Romans, would thus dissipate the wealth in his treasuries, especially as Persian rulers seem, even at the best of times, always to have been short of money for their military ventures.
kept a keen watch over them and over the subjects in general. Thus the meritoriousness of his good conduct became clear, his fame spread widely and he stood out above all other monarchs.

It is said that, in the eleventh year of his reign, he marched against the city of Niṣibīn, where there was a garrison of Roman troops, and besieged them for a considerable period of time. But then he received news of happenings in one of the regions of Khurāsān that required his personal attention, so he headed for there, restored order and returned to Niṣibīn. They allege that the city’s wall split asunder of its own accord, and a breach was opened up for Sābūr, by means of which he was able to gain entry. He then killed the [defending] soldiers, enslaved the women and children, and seized an immense sum of wealth stored up there for Qaysar [i.e., the Roman emperor]. Then he traversed the territory to Syria and Roman Anatolia (bilād al-Rūm), and conquered a

90. Niṣibīn or Naṣibīn, Greek Nasabis, was one of the most important towns and fortresses of Upper Mesopotamia, situated on the Hirmas river, an affluent of the Khābūr, in the plain to the south of the mountainous region of Tür ʿAbdin. In Roman and Byzantine times it came within the district of Bēth ʿArabhāyē, and in early Islamic times, in that of Diyār Rabīʿah within the province of al-Jazīrah. Known as a settlement in Assyrian times, possession of it oscillated between the Parthians and the Romans, until in A.D. 195 Septimius Severus came to Niṣibīn and made it the capital of the new province of Septimia Nesibi Colonia. Control of the region was disputed by the Romans and Persians more or less continuously in the third and fourth centuries, with this campaign of Shābūr I’s falling in the 250s [see n. 91 below]; but after the peace agreement of 363 between Jovian and Shābūr II, Niṣibīn and Sinjār or Singara passed under Persian control more or less permanently. This period of Persian domination enabled Niṣibīn to become an especially flourishing center of the [to the Byzantines, heretical] Nestorian Church; under this last, it functioned as the metropolitan seat for the region of Bēth ʿArabhāyē. See Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 288–89; PW, XVII/r, s.v. Niṣibis (J. Sturm); Le Strange, Lands, 94–95; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l’empire perse, 83; Christensen, Sassanides, 218–24; Canard, Histoire de la dynastie des H’amdanides, 100–101; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 125, 137–38; ELP, s.v. Naṣibīn [E. Honigmann–C. E. Bosworth].

91. No clear picture emerges from the scattered details in the sources about Shābūr’s wars against Rome, with a resultant uncertainty about chronology. The eleventh year of Shābūr’s reign would be 251, and it is possible that Niṣibīn was attacked [and for at least the second time] in 251 or 252; but Shābūr’s expeditions into Asia Minor and Syria must have extended beyond that date, and the emperor Valerian did not in any case begin his reign until 253. See Nöldeke, trans. 31 n. 3; E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire. I. De l’etat romain à l’état byzantin (284–476), 6; and the discussion of the dating of the Persian capture of Niṣibīn at this time in E. Kettenhofen, Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr. nach der Inschrift Šāpuhr I. an der Ka’be-ye Zartošt (SKZ), 44–46.
large number of the cities there. Among these, he is said to have conquered Qalūqiyah (Cilicia) and Qadḫūqiyah (Cappadocia) and to have besieged one of the [Roman] kings who happened to be in Anatolia called al-Riyanūs (Valerian[us]) in the city of Antioch. He took him prisoner, and transported him, and a large number of the troops who were with him, and settled them at Junday Sābūr (Jundishāpur). It is mentioned that he compelled al-

92. That is, the emperor Valerian, Publius Licinius Valerianus (r. 253–60). See on him Der kleine Pauly, V, s.v. Valerianus (G. Winckler). W. B. Henning observed that it was strange that the tradition that came down to al-Tabari from the Xwaddāy-nāmag, with the name as al-Riyanūs, rendered the Roman emperor's name more correctly than did Shābūr's victory inscription (see next note), with its wry'rmswy. See his "The Great Inscription of Shāpūr I," 834.

93. According to the trilingual (in Parthian, Middle Persian, and Greek) inscription erected by Shābūr on the Ka'bah-yi Zardusht at Naqsh-i Rustam in 260 or shortly afterward, the Persian emperor captured Valerian with his own hands. The question of the exact dating of the capture of the Roman emperor—for which August or September 260 would seem to be termini post quem—is discussed by Kettenhofen, Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr., 97–99.

The discovery of the Ka'ba-yi Zardusht trilingual ((SKZ) by the Chicago University Persepolis Expedition of 1936–39 marked a great step forward in our knowledge of the campaigns of Shābūr against the Romans and of the history of the early Sāsānīd rulers in general. Wiesehöfer has emphasized that inscriptions like this one at Naqsh-i Rustam, the inscription of Narsēh at Paikuli (see n. 141 below) and that of the High Priest Kerder at Naqsh-i Rajab, are important inter alia for their information on the early Sāsānīd court and its officials, and on the contemporary conception of royal power and its relationship to the divinity Ahura Mazda, and, in part, as res gestae, the exploits of the Sāsānīds, thus supplying a corrective to non-Persian sources such as the Byzantine ones, see his Ancient Persia, pp. 154–55.

The information of the three texts making up the complete Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription, as edited by Martin Sprengling (the two Middle Iranian texts) and Andrē Maricq (the Greek text) has been compared and integrated with the information of the Greek and Latin historical texts, of coin legends, etc., by Kettenhofen in his monograph mentioned in the previous paragraph, meant to accompany his TAVO map (BV 11) Vorderer Orient. Römer und Sāsānīden in der Zeit der Reichskrise (224–284 n. Chr.) and its Sonderkarte, Die Kriege Sāpūhrs I. mit Rom nach SKZ; the monograph itself includes three maps illustrating Roman and Sāsānīd campaigns in Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia. A new Gesamtedition of the three SKZ texts is being prepared by Dr. Philip Huyse and will appear as part of the Corpus Inscriptionum Iranicarum under the title Die dreisprachige Inschrift Sāpūhrs I. an der Ka'ba-i Zardusht (SKZ).

Shābūr's victories over the Romans were also immortalised for him in such rock reliefs as at Naqsh-i Rustam and in those of the Bishāpūr gorge. See Henning, "The Great Inscription of Shāpūr I," 833–35; Christensen, Sāsānīdes, 231–24; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 92–94, 96–98; Gignoux, "Middle Persian Inscrip-
Riyānūs to set to work building a dam (shādurwān) at Tustar, whose breadth was to be one thousand cubits.94 The Roman [emperor] constructed this with the aid of a group of men whom he had caused to be brought from Anatolia, and he held Sābūr to a promise to free him once the dam was completed. It is said that

94. This dam, popularly known as the Band-i Qāyšar “Emperor’s dam” from the alleged, but probably legendary, role of the captured Roman ruler in building it (although Roman prisoners of war were very probably involved in this work, as also at the monuments of Bishābūr; cf. Christensen, Sassanides, 220–21, and Nina Garsolan, “Byzantium and the Sassanians,” 581), came to be regarded as one of the wonders of the world by the mediaeval Muslims. It was in reality only one of many shādurwāns on the Dujayl or Karon, barriers that divided up the river’s waters into irrigation channels running off from the main flow and that at the same time relieved the pressure of waters in winter and spring from the snows that fell in the Sābūr took from al-Riyānūs a great financial indemnity, and set him free after cutting off his nose; others, however, say that Sābūr killed him.\(^95\)

Now there was, facing Takrit\(^96\) and between the Tigris and Eu-phrates, a city called al-Ḥaḍr (Hatran),\(^97\) and there was there a man

---

Zagros Mountains, where the Kārūn and its affluents rise.

Tustar (Persian, Shušhtar) was in early Islamic times the next most important town of Khūzistān after the provincial capital al-Ahwāz, and was situated on the Kārūn; but its pre-Islamic history goes back at least to the time of Pliny (first century A.D.), who mentions it. See Yaqūt, Buldan, II, 29–31; Le Strange, Lands; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 97; EP, s.v. Shuštar (J. H. Kramers-C. E. Bosworth).

The term shādurwān has many meanings in early Islamic usage, often in connection with irrigation devices, but the basic meaning seems to be that of a raised platform or dais, this being then extended to masonry walls and revetments for storing and controlling waters and their flow. E. Benveniste thought that this obviously Iranian word was probably Parthian in origin. See his “Le sens du mot persan shādurwān,” 31–37; Bosworth, “Some Remarks on the Terminology of Irrigation Practices and Hydraulic Constructions in the Eastern Arab and Iranian Worlds in the Third–Fifth Centuries A.H.,” 83–84.

95. Nothing definite is known of Valerian’s death. The Byzantine historian Agathias [who derived much of his information on the Sāsānids from the interpreter Sergius, who had been given access to the Persian royal annals while in the Persian capital on diplomatic work] says that Shābūr, a notoriously bloodthirsty monarch, had Valerian flayed alive, but this is unconfirmed elsewhere. See Averil Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 120–21, 138.

96. Reading bi-hiyal as in Noldeke’s text, whereas he had in his translation, 33, followed a defective reading, bi-jibāl. There are, of course, no hills, let alone mountains, near Takrit, lying as this town does on the Tigris; see EP, s.v. Takrit (J. H. Kramers and C. E. Bosworth).

97. The city of Hatra, Greek Atrai, lay to the southwest of Mawṣil on the Nahr Tharthar, an affluent of the Tigris, but even by early Islamic times the exact site was not known to the Arabs. In the Parthian period, Hatra was the center of one of a chain of Arab principalities along the fringes of the Syrian Desert through Com-magene and Edessa to Emesa and Palmyra, but was clearly under considerable Iranian political and cultural influence. Various of its princes bore Iranian names, such as the typically Parthian one of Sanatrūk (which may be behind the Arabic name of the ruler given here, al-Sātirūn, for suggestions on the etymology of the name Sanatrūk itself, see Eilers, “Iran and Mesopotamia,” 491 n. 3) and that of Vologases, and Hatra was usually an ally of the Arsacids against Roman pressure. With the fall of its Parthian protectors, Hatra declined in power. It passed temporarily under Roman control, bringing down on it the wrath of Shāpūr I in the middle years of the third century, as related here [other, less likely, dates for this are given in Arabic sources other than al-Ṭabarī].

Hatra became famed in early Islamic lore as a symbol of the transience of earthly power, since it seemed by then to have disappeared from the face of the earth, and the story of the city’s betrayal by al-Ḍayzan’s daughter al-Naḍīrah struck the popular imagination. It must have entered into Arabic literature either through Ibn Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbâk

from the Jarâmîqâh called al-Sâṭîrûn. He is the person about whom Abu Du‘âd al-Iyâdî speaks.

I see how death has come down from al-Ḥâdr upon the leader of its people, al-Sâṭîrûn.

The Arabs, however, called him al-Dâyan. It is said that he was a man from the people of Bâ Jarmâ, but according to Hishâm b.
[Muḥammad] al-Kalbî, he was an Arab from Qudâ‘ah, his genealogy being al-Dâyan b. Mu‘âwiyyah b. al-‘Abîd b. al-Ajrâm b. ‘Amr
b. al-Nakha‘ b. Salîh b. Ḥulwân b. ʿImrân b. al-Ḥâfî b. Qudâ‘ah, that his mother Jayhalah was from the tribe of Tazîd b. Ḥulwân al-Muqaffâ‘s Arabic version of the Khwâdây-nâmâg or through the traditions transmitted by Ibn al-Kalbi, and here utilized by al-Ṭabarî, based inter alia on references in the verses of the poets of al-Hîrâh, Abû Du‘âd al-Iyâdî, and ‘Adî b.

Zayd. As Yarshater notes, “Iranian National History,” 400–401, intriguing anecdotes and touches like this may have evolved to provide an element of entertainment within the narratives of dynastic and political history. See Nöldeke, trans. 33 n. 4; PW, VII/2, s.v. Hatra [M. Streck]; Christensen, Sassanides, 218–19; F.
Altheim and R. Stiehl, Die Araber in der alten Welt, II, 191f., IV, 263f.; Eilers, “Iran and Mesopotamia,” 490–91; Bosworth, “Iran and the Arabs before Islam,” 594–96; EP, s.v. al-Ḥâdr (Ch. Pellat).

98. That is, from the inhabitants of Bâ Jarmâ, Syriac Bê(th) Garmê, the region to the east of the middle Tigris and of Takrît, lying south of the Lesser Zab and the region of Adiabene, it extended to Shahrazûr and the fringes of the Zagros range. As an important Christian region in Sasanid times, it was the seat of a metropolitan bishopsric. Arabic Jarâmîqâh, sing. Jarmagi, derives from Syriac Garmagâyê. See Nöldeke, trans. 35 n. 1; Marquart, Erânshahr, 21–22; Fiey, Assyrie chrétiennne, III, 11–145; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 335–36.

99. Pre-Islamic poet of al-Hîrâh, floruit in the middle years of the sixth century under the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III; he was classed among the muqillûn, those poets who only composed a small amount of verse. This verse is given in G. E. von Grunebaum, “Abû Du‘âd al-Iyâdî. Collection of Fragments,” as one of a fragment of thirteen verses. See on the poet, Abû al-Faraj al-Iṣfahânî, Kitâb al-Aghânî, XVI, 373–81; Rothstein, Lahmiden, 28, 133; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe,

100. Nöldeke, trans. 35 n. 1, nevertheless thought that al-Sâṭîrûn and Dayzan were two separate persons; the first name a non-Arabic one [see n. 97 above], and the second one Arabic, and averred that the only sure name of a king of Hatra that we know is the Barsêmias/Barsêmios, a clearly Aramean name, in Herodian, he interpreted as Barsamyâ but which von Gutschmid, “Bemerkungen zu Tabaris Sasanidengeschichte,” 735, preferred to read as Barsênios = Barsîn. Nöldeke surmised that the Dayzan mentioned here might possibly have been the founder of the Dâyanâbâd/Ṭayzanâbâd of al-Balâdûrî, Futûh, 284, and likewise connected with the Marj al-Dâyanûn on the middle Euphrates near al-Raqqah of Yaqût, Buldân, V, 101.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

and that he was exclusively known by his mother’s name. Ibn al-Kalbî goes on to assert that he was the ruler over the land of al-Jazîrah and that he had with him [as his supporters] innumerable numbers of the Banû ‘Abîd b. al-Ajîram and [other] tribes of Qudâ’ah. [It is said that] his kingdom stretched as far as Syria.

When Sâbûr, son of Ardashîr, was away in the region of Khurâsân, al-Dayzan made an incursion into the Sawâd. When Sâbûr got back from his period of absence, he was told what al-Dayzan had been up to. ‘Amr b. Ilâh (? b. al-Judayy b. al-Dahâ’ b. Jusham b. Ḫûlwa‘n b. ‘Imrân b. al-Hâfi b. Qudâ’ah composed these verses in connection with al-Dayzan’s actions:

We encountered them [in battle] with a host of the [Banû] ‘Ilâf and with [a troop of] strong-hoofed stallions.
The Persians received at our hands exemplary punishment, and we massacred the Hîrbdâhs of Shahrazûr.

We advanced toward the Persians [al-A’âjîm] from afar with a host from al-Jazîrah as in a blaze of fire.

When Sâbûr was informed about what al-Dayzan had done, he headed towards him until he halted before al-Dayzan’s fortress, while al-Dayzan entrenched himself within it. Ibn al-Kalbî asserts that Sâbûr was involved in the siege of the fortress for four years, completely unable to destroy it or to get his hands on al-Dayzan.

101. That is, as Ibn Jayhâlah; cf. al-Baladhûrî, Fetûh, 284.
102. Nöldëke, trans. 39 n. 1, was skeptical about the contemporaneity of this poet with the events alluded to and thought that the [later] author must have had al-A’shâ’s verses in mind. In Abû al-Faraj al-Îṣfahânî, Aghâni3, II, 142-43, giving the story of Sâbûr’s destruction of al-Ḥâdr, the poet’s name appears as ‘Amr b. Ilâh.
103. The place-name Shahrazûr in western Kurdistân, though admittedly a place with a pre-Islamic history [see EI2, s.v. Shahrazûr (V. Minorsky-C. E. Bosworth)], gives little sense in this context. Nöldëke, trans. 36 n. 3, endeavoring to improve the reading of these verses from parallel sources, opined that the reading Bahrâsîr – Bih Ardashîr [cf. al-Ṭabarî, I, 820, p. 16 above] of Abû al-Faraj al-Îṣfahânî, Aghâni3, II, 37 [wrongly corrected to Shahrazûr in Aghâni3!] was certainly the right one. It undoubtedly makes more sense that Zoroastrian priests, hîrbdâhs, should be encountered in the central Mesopotamian plain than in the mountains of Kurdistân.
104. Following Nöldëke’s suggestion, loc. cit., that one should follow the reading of Abû al-Faraj al-Îṣfahânî, Aghâni3- mil-jazîrati, for the text’s ka-al-jazîrati.
However, al-Aššā Ḥaymūn b. Qays\textsuperscript{105} has mentioned in his poem that Sābūr was engaged in the siege of the fortress for only two years, saying:

Have you not seen al-Ḥadīr, whose people always enjoyed ease of life? But does anyone favored with ease of life enjoy it for ever?

Shāḥabūr of the Hosts [al-Junūd] remained before it for two years, wielding his battle axes there.

But his [i.e., the ruler of al-Ḥiraḥ's] Lord vouchsafed him no access of strength, and pivots such as his could not remain firm [i.e., the ease of life he had enjoyed could not endure forever].

When his Lord saw what he was doing, He swept down on him with a violent blow, without him being able to retaliate.

He had called upon his partisans, "Come forward to your affair, which has been already severed,

And die noble deaths through your own swords; I see that the real warrior takes on for himself the burden of death with equanimity."\textsuperscript{106}

One of al-Ḍayzan's daughters, called al-Naḍīrah,\textsuperscript{107} was menstruous, hence was segregated in the outer suburb of the city, as was the custom of the time with women during their menstrual periods. According to what was generally acknowledged, she was one of the most beautiful women of her time, just as Sābūr was one of the most handsome men of his age. The two of them saw each other, and fell madly in love with each other. She sent a message to him with the words, “What would you give me if I were to indicate to you how you could bring about the destruction of the wall of this city and how you could kill my father?” He replied, “Whatever you might choose; and I would elevate you above all my other wives and would make you my closest spouse to their exclusion.” She instructed him, “Take a silver-colored collar dove, and write on its leg with the menstrual blood of a blue-eyed virgin girl. Then release it, and it will alight on the city wall, and the latter will crumble away.”

\textsuperscript{105} Here giving the full name of the poet (on whom see n. 106, below) in order to distinguish him from several Arabic poets with the cognomen al-Aššā "the night-blind one."

\textsuperscript{106} R. Geyer, \textit{Gedichte von Abu Baṣīr Maimūn ibn Qais al-Aššā}, Arabic text 33–34, poem no. 4, vv. 60–65. For this mukhaḍram poet [d. after 3/625] who frequent the Lakhmi court at al-Ḥiraḥ in the early part of his life, see Rothstein, \textit{Laḥmiden}, 21; Siddiqi, \textit{Studien über die persische Fremdwörter}, 77; Blachère, \textit{Histoire de la littérature arabe}, II, 321–25; \textit{EI2}, s.v. al-Ašš, Maymūn b. Kays [W. Caskel]. Nöldeke, trans. 37 n. 4, pointed out that there is no mention—at least, in this fragment of which was probably a longer poem—of Dayzan and his daughter al-Naḍīrah's treachery; the verses merely stress the well-worn theme of the fragility and perishability of human endeavor.

\textsuperscript{107} In al-Dinawārī, \textit{al-Akḥbār al-Ṭiwal}, 48, she is called Mulaykāh.

That was in fact the talisman of the city, and only this could destroy the city. So Sābūr did that and got ready to attack them (sc., the city’s defenders). The king of al-Ḥadr’s daughter went on to say, “I will give the guards wine, and when they are laid out on the ground [by its stupefying effects], kill them and enter the city.” He did all this; the city’s defenses collapsed totally, and he took it by storm and killed al-Ḍayzan on that very day. The splinter groups from Qūḍā’ah, who were with al-Ḍayzan, were annihilated, so that no part of them known as such remains to this present day. Some clans of the Banū Ḥulwān were likewise completely destroyed. ‘Amr b. Ilah, who was with al-Ḍayzan, has said:

Have you not been filled with grief as the reports come in about what has happened to the leading men of the Banū ‘Abīd, And of the slaying of [al-]Ḍayzan and his brothers, and of the 108. In many premodern societies, menstrual blood has been regarded as possessing special power, in certain cases for healing but more often for wreaking violent and harmful effects; whence the taboos that usually surround menstrual women and the menstrual flow and which often cause them to be separated from the rest of the community at times of menstruation (as was the case here with al-NDARIRAH, see above). Pliny the Elder wrote in his Natural History, Book XXVIII. XXIII. 77, “Over and above all this there is no limit to women’s power . . . Wild indeed are the stories told of mysterious and awful power of the menstrual discharge itself . . .” (tr. Rackham, VII, 55).

---

Here, the violent effect, the shock to the order of nature that spontaneously brings about the destruction of the walls of Hatra, arises from the passage of unclean menstrual blood from the pure virgin to the pure dove and its consequent supernatural effect.

109. NOLDEKE, trans. 38 n. 4, notes that this additional explanation for the fall of the city is superfluous, given the magical effect of the dove smeared with menstrual blood, and must be an attempt at a rationalizing explanation of events.

110. Hulwān was the great-grandson of Qūḍā’ah; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 279, II, 331.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak men of Tazid, who were wont to ride forth in the cavalry squadrons?

Sabur of the Hosts attacked them with war elephants, richly caparisoned, and with his heroic warriors,
And he destroyed the stone blocks of the fortress’s columns, whose foundation stones were like iron blocks.111

Sabur then reduced the city to ruins and carried off al-Dayzan’s daughter al-Nadirah, marrying her at ‘Ayn al-Tamr.112 It is mentioned that she complained volubly the whole night through about the hardness of her bed, even though this was of finely woven silk cloth stuffed with raw silk. A search was made for what was distressing her, and behold, it turned out to be a myrtle leaf stuck in one of the folds of the skin of her abdomen which was irritating her.113 [Ibn al-Kalbi] goes on to relate: Because her skin was so fine, one could see right to her marrow. Sabur thereupon said to her, “Tell me then, what did your father give you to eat?” She replied, “Cream, marrow from bones and honey from virgin bees, together with the choicest wine!” He exclaimed, “By your father! I have known you more recently than your father, and am dearer to you than him, who gave you such food as you mention!” (i.e., you should not therefore start complaining). So he commanded a man to mount a wild, unbroken horse; he tied her locks of hair to its tail, and then made the horse gallop off114 until it tore her into pieces.

111. These verses are also given in Abû al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānî, Aghānī3, II, 142-43; al-Mas‘ûdi, Murâjî, IV, 85 = § 1411 [three verses]; Yâqût, Buldân, II, 268–69. Nöldeke, trans. 39 n. 1, doubted very much the authenticity of Arabic poetry from so early a period.
112. This was a tassûj or administrative subdistrict to the west of the Euphrates and south of Hit on the Syrian Desert fringes; the settlement of ‘Ayn al-Tamr “the spring of the date palm” still had a small fortress in al-Maqdisî’s time [fourth/tenth century], but the site has now disappeared. See Yâqût, Buldân, IV, 176–77; Le Strange, Lands, 65, 81; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 41–42, 285, 289–90, 295–311. For the term tassûj, see EI², s.v. Ṭassûj [M. J. Morony], and the remarks on Sasanid administrative geography in n. 117 below.
114. For this verb istarkada, see Glossarium, p. cclxix. Nöldeke, trans. 39 n. 4, compared al-Nadîrah’s fate with the [apparently authentic] account of the death of the Merovingian queen Brunhilda, dragged to her death at a horse’s tail in 613, as narrated by the chronicler Fredegar.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

A poet has said in connection with this:

The fortress has become desolate on account of [al-] Naḍîrah, likewise al-Mirbâ' because of her and the banks of the Tharthâr.\(^{115}\)

The poets have written extensively about this [al-] Dayzan in their verse. 'Adî b. Zayd alludes to him in his words:\(^{116}\)

And [where is now] the ruler (akhû) of al-Ḥadr, who once built it and for whom the taxation of the Tigris and the Khâbûr was collected?

He raised it up firmly with marble and covered it over with plaster, yet the birds have found nesting places in its pinnacles.

The blows of ill fortune did not frighten him, yet kingly power ebbed away from him and his portals are now forsaken.

It is also said that Sâbûr built in Maysân [the town of] Shâdh Sâbûr, which is called in Aramaic (al-nabatiyyah) Dimā.\(^{117}\)

---

\(^{115}\) This verse is in fact by 'Adî b. Zayd (see n. 116 below) and is included in the collected Diwân 'Adî b. Zayd al-'Ibâdî, ed. al-Mu'aybîdî, 135, fragment no. 67. The Tharthâr river flowed past al-Ḥadr, and al-Mirbâ' ("place with vegetation from spring rains") must have been a local site.

\(^{116}\) 'Adî b. Zayd, of Tamîmi origin, flourished in the second half of the sixth century as the most notable exponent of the Hîran school of poets, in whom the indigenous Arabic, the Christian culture of the 'Ībâd and, probably, Persian culture, all combined. Hence 'Adî's poetry mingleth Christian and Biblical themes with the ascetic and fatalist strains of desert life. His administrative career was spent in the Persian capital Ctesiphon as a translator and advisor on Arab affairs for Khusraw Abarwêz and, after 580, at al-Ḥîrah with al-Nu'mân III, till the jealousies and intrigues of his enemies brought about his death ca. 600, as detailed by al-Ṭabarî, I, 1016–24, pp. 339–51 below. His complete Diwân has not survived and only scattered verses are known. See Rothstein, Laḥmidîn, 109–11; Siddiqi, Studien über die persische Fremdwörter, 76–77; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 300–301; EP, s.v. 'Adî b. Zayd [F. Gabrieli].

These famous verses by 'Adî on the lost glories of al-Ḥîrah are from the long poem in the Diwân, ed. al-Mu'aybîdî, 88, fragment no. 16.

\(^{117}\) Shâdh Sâbûr was both a town and a kûrah or administrative district in Maysân, the later Islamic administrative division of Ard Kâskar; see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 155. Marquard suggested that the place's full name might have been Ėrân-shâd Shâbûr "the joy of the Iranians [is] Shâbûr"; see Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 102. The local nabaṭî name of Dimā (in the Cairo text, the equally incomprehensible Rimā) remains obscure.
In the time of Sābūr, there arose Mānī the Zindiq.118

It is said that, when Sābūr proceeded to the site of Junday Sābūr in order to lay down the city’s foundations, he came across an aged man there called Bil. So he asked him, “Is it permissible for a city to be constructed on this spot?” Bil replied, “If I am vouchsafed the ability to write, despite my having reached an advanced age, then it is allowable for you to build a city in this place.” Sābūr said to him, “Now indeed, the two things whose possibility you deny shall come to pass,” and he thereupon sketched out the plan of the city and handed Bil over to an instructor, with instructions to teach him to write and to be able to do arithmetical calculations within one year. The instructor shut himself up with Bil, and began by shaving off Bil’s hair and his beard, lest these two things distract him, and then taught him thoroughly. After this, he brought Bil to the king, Bil having become effective and skillful in his studies. So Sābūr entrusted to him the job of calculating expenditure on the city and of setting up a proper accounting procedure for these payments. The king established the region (i.e., of the city and its surrounding rural areas) as a separate administrative division (kurah)119 and called it Bih-az-Andiw-i Sābūr, which

118. On the rise of Mānī, son of Pātik, and his movement at this time, see G. Widengren, “Manichaeism and Its Iranian Background,” 965–90. The founder of the new faith actually stemmed, according to the much later Islamic historian al-Biruni, from Kūṭhā to the south of Ctesiphon, on the canal connecting the Tigris and the Euphrates. In later Arabic lore, he appears as Mānī b. Fātik or Fattik; see EP, s.v. Mānī b. Fātik (C. E. Bosworth).

The term zindiq came to be applied in Sāsānian times not only to the Manichaeans but also, subsequently, to the Mazdakites, while in early Islamic times its use was generalized to cover adherents of many heretical movements, especially within ‘Abbāsid Iraq, and as a general term of abuse for any religious deviants. See G. Vajda, “Les zindiqs en pays d’Islam au début de la période abbaside,” 173–229; F. Gabrieli, “La «zandaqa» au 1er siècle abbaside,” 23–38; EI1, s.v. Zindiq (L. Massignon). Some older authorities sought an etymology for zindiq in Aramaic zaddiqâ “righteous [one]” or even Greek, but more recently the view has been put forward that it is an indigenous Iranian term, from MP zandik, a person who has a deviant interpretation (zand) of the sacred text of the Avesta; hence early Armenian writers contrast the zandiks with the orthodox Zoroastrian Magians. The question remains open. See Sir Harold Bailey’s Note appended to Widengren’s chapter, in CHI, III/2, 907; EP, s.v. Zindık (F. C. de Blois), opting for an Aramaic origin.

119. For this term, probably stemming from Greek chōra, see EP, s.v. Kūra (D. Sourdel). It denoted something like an administrative division within a province (Fārs, for instance, having within it five kūrahs in Sāsānian and early Islamic times), the equivalent, according to Yaqūt, quoting Ḥamzah al-İsfahānî, of the Persian means “the city of Sâbûr’s which is better than Antioch.” This is the city that is [now] called Junday Sâbûr, which the people of al-Ahwâz, however, call Bil, from the name of the man who was overseer of the city’s construction.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

When Sâbûr was near to death, he appointed as ruler his son Hurmuz and laid upon him testamentary instructions, ordering him to base his conduct upon them. There are differing views on the length of Sâbûr’s reign. Some authorities put it at thirty years and fifteen days, others at thirty-one years, six months, and nineteen days.

istan/ustân, and was itself divided up into component tassûj̱s and rustâqs. F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, with Special Reference to Circumstances in Iraq, 164–67, assumed a descending order of istân/kûrah—tassûj̱—rustâq—dih/qaryah for the hierarchy of administrative subdivisions in Sâsânid Mesopotamia and Persia and these same lands during early Islamic times, but the texts are, however, inconsistent and at times contradictory. The Sirât Anûšharwân (see on this n. 624 below) posits, in the context of Khusrâw Anûšharwân’s administrative and fiscal reforms (see al-Ṭabarî, I, 960–63, pp. 255–62 below) a hierarchy of province or region (balad), administrative division (kûrah), rural district (rustâq), village (qaryah), down to individual taxpayer, and this corresponds largely to how al-Ṭabarî, I, 814, pp. 3–5 above, describes Ardashîr I’s origins. See Nödeke, trans. 446–47 Excursus 3; Wadie Juwaideh, The Introductory Chapters of Yâqût’s Mu’jam al-Buldân, 56, 57–58; Valeria F. Piacentini, “Madina/shahr, qarya/dih, nâhiya/rustâq. The city as political-administrative institution: the continuity of a Sasanian model,” 96–99; and above all, the detailed discussion of G. Widengren, “Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien,” 122–48.

120. See nn. 58, 93 above.

121. This tale of Bil’s educational achievement revolves round learning the notoriously difficult and ambiguous Pahlavi script.

122. Shâbûr I’s reign was 240–70, since he was crowned as coruler with his father Ardashîr I in 240, probably in April of that year, almost two years before the latter’s death; see the discussion on the regnal dates of Shâbûr by Kettenhofen in his Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr., 46–49. Shâbûr’s name appears on his coins as SHPWHRY = Shâbuhr. See on his coins Paruck, Sâsânian Coins, 52–53, 316–22, 416–19, Plates IV-V, Table II, Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics. 43, Table II, Plate 2; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 79–83; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma’dirif, 654 [brief entry], al-Ya’qûbî, Ta’rikh, I, 180–81 [brief note of Sâbûr’s Roman campaign, but mainly concerned with the appearance of Manî, the polemical works he composed, and Sâbûr’s own attraction to Manichaeism before he was brought back to almajûsiyyah by the Chief Môbadhî]; al-Dinawarî, al-Akhbûr al-tiwâl, 46 [only a short notice, on Sâbûr’s Roman campaign and capture of the Roman emperor, and his construction works in Khûzistân and at Junday-Sâbûr]; al-Mas’ûdî, Murûj, II, 163–66 – §§589–93 [Manî’s rise to prominence and Sâbûr’s part in it, together with Holders of Power after Ardashīr b. Bābak

[Hurmuz I]

Then after Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak, the royal power was assumed by his son Hurmuz (I).123 He was called “the Bold” (al-jarfl,124 and resembled Ardashīr in bodily constitution and appearance, but did not come up to him in judgment and skillful management.125 Nevertheless, he was outstanding for his fortitude in battle, boldness, and massive build. His mother, according to what is said, was one of the daughters of King Mihrak, whom Ardashīr killed at Ardashīr Khurrah.126 This arose from the fact that Ardashīr’s astrologers had told him that a person would arise from Mihrak’s stock who would attain the royal power. So Ardashīr hunted down all of his stock and killed them. However, Hurmuz’s mother, who was an intelligent, beautiful, perfectly formed, and physically strong person, slipped the latter’s counsels on good rule and the maintenance of an efficient army; idem, Tanbih, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Ḵeṣāfānī, Ṭaʿrīḵh, 44–45 (enumerates in fair detail all the cities Sābūr built, with their names and comments on their plans); Ibn al-Ḵathīr, Kāmil, I, 385–88. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarḵi-Balʿami, trans. II, 75–85.

Shābūr seems to have been a less zealous adherent of Zoroastrianism than his father, and is even said by some sources to have been favorable toward Manichaeism, although Zoroastrianism was at this time being consolidated as the state religion of Persia through the untiring efforts of men like the Chief Herbed Kerder. During his time, the influence in the state of Kerder and the prophet Mani seems to have been evenly balanced. Shābūr’s deportations from Antioch and elsewhere in Syria and in Upper Mesopotamia actually brought increased numbers of Christians into the Persian Empire, so that Christian communities were now implanted in the towns of the heartland Fārs and in places like Ardashīr Khurrah, the preferred residence of Ardashīr I. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l’Empire perse, 19–20; Chaumont, “Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l’Empire iranien,” 168–80; S. Brock, “Christians in the Sasanian Empire: A Case of Divided Loyalties,” 1ff.

For recent studies on Shābūr’s reign in general, see, e.g., Christensen, Sassanides, 179ff, 218–26; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 208–17; idem, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 124–27, 178; EP, svv. Sāsānids (M. Moryon), Shāpūr (C. E. Bosworth).

123. In Pahlavi, Ohrmazd, Greek Ἑωρμίςδης, from Ahura Mazdā, the name in the Avesta of the great divinity of ancient Iranian religion. See Justi, Namenbuch, 7–9; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 702; Elr, s.v. Ahura Mazdā (M. Boyce).

124. In al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 166 = §593, and al-Khwārazmī, Mafāṭīḥ al-ʿulûm, 102, we have for this al-βατάλ “the warrior, hero.” Cf. Nöeldeke, trans. 43 n. 2.

125. Nöeldeke, trans., 43 n. 3, observes that the forty years or so from Shāpūr I’s death to the accession of Shāpūr II were ones of comparative weakness and decline for the Sāsānids.

126. See al-Ṭabarḵi, I, 817, pp. 10–11 above.
Holders of Power after Ardashīr b. Bābak

away surreptitiously into the desert and took refuge with some shepherds.

Now Sābūr set out one day hunting. He pursued his quarry enthu-thusiastically, and became very thirsty. At that point, the tents where Hurmuz's mother had sought refuge came into his view. He made for them, but found the shepherds away. He asked for water, and the woman there gave him some. He perceived that she was outstandingly beautiful and had a remarkable carriage and a noble face. Shortly afterward, the shepherds returned. Sābūr asked them about her, and since one of the shepherds gave out that she was a member of his family, Sābūr asked him to give her to him in marriage. The shepherd conceded this to him, so Sābūr went off with her to his own encampment, commanded her to be washed clean, suitably clothed, and adorned. He wanted to have conjugal relations with her. But when he was alone with her, and sought from her what men usually seek from women, she held back and fended him off when he tried to get near her, with a degree of force he found unpleasing, and he marveled at her physical strength. When she behaved like this for some time, it aroused his anger, and he enquired after the cause. So she told him that she was the daughter of Mihrak, and that she had only done what she had done in order to spare him from Ardashīr. He made an agreement with her to conceal her real position, and had sexual congress with her. She then gave birth to Hurmuz, but Sābūr subsequently concealed the whole matter.

When Hurmuz was several years old, Ardashīr rode out one day, and turned aside to Sābūr's dwelling because he wanted to tell Sābūr something. He went into the house unexpectedly. When Ardashīr had stretched himself out comfortably, Hurmuz came forth, having by this time grown into a sturdy youth. He had in his hand a polo stick that he was playing with, and was crying out in pursuit of the ball. When Ardashīr's eye fell on him, this perturbed him, and he became aware of the resemblance in the youth to his own family, because the qualities of Persian kingship (al-kayiyyah) characteristic of Ardashīr's house could not be con-

127. An Arabic abstract noun coined from the name of the ancient, at best semilegendary, ruling dynasty of the Kayānids, Kay [Avestan Kawi] being the princely title used by these, passing into MP and NP with the generalized sense of sealed and could not be disregarded by anyone, because of certain specific traits visible in members of that house: a handsome face, a stout physique, and other bodily features by which Ardashir's house was distinguished. So Ardashir made him come near, and asked Sābūr about him. The latter fell down [before him] in obeisance, acknowledging his fault over all that he had done, and told his father the truth about the whole affair. Ardashir, nevertheless, expressed joy over him, and told him that he had now [for the first time] realized the truth of what the astrologers had said regarding Mihrak's offspring and regarding the one from them who would reign as king; the astrologers had simply been envisaging Hurmuz in this connection, since he was from the stock of Mihrak; and this had now provided consolation for the perturbation in his mind and had dispelled it.

When Ardashir died, and the royal power passed to Sābūr, he appointed Hurmuz governor of Khurāsān and dispatched him thither. Hurmuz adopted an independent policy, subdued the rulers of the nations in adjacent lands, and behaved as a highly proud and effective ruler. Hence various calumniators delated him to Sābūr and implanted the delusion in the latter's mind that, if Sābūr were to summon Hurmuz [to his court], the latter would not respond, and that he was planning to seize the royal power from him. News of this reached Hurmuz. It is said that he went aside into a private place, and cut into his hand and severed it, placed on the hand some preservative, wrapped it up in a piece of costly clothing, put it in a casket and sent it off to Sābūr. He wrote a letter to him about what he had heard (sc., the calumnies concerning him), and [explained] that he had only done what he had done (i.e., cut off and dispatched the hand) in order to dispel all suspicions about him, for among their customs was the practice of not raising anyone to kingly power who had a physical defect.128 When the letter and the accompanying casket reached Sābūr, he became cut up through grief, and wrote back to Hurmuz telling him how filled with affliction he had become at Hurmuz’s action, excused himself and informed him that, if Hurmuz were to cut up his body limb by limb, he would not choose anyone else for the royal power. He then proclaimed him [his successor as] king.

"king." See Christensen, Les Kayanides, 9–10, 17ff., 43; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 436ff.; EI², s.v. Kayānids [ed.].

128. Nöldeke, trans. 45 n. 1, noted the information of the Byzantine historian Procopius that "a one-eyed person or someone afflicted by any other serious defect, could not become king of Persia"; but this was probably a near-universal principle in the Ancient Near East and the classical Eastern Mediterranean world, and was one of continued validity in later times, since physical wholeness was certainly required for the Byzantine emperors and the Islamic caliphs.

It is said that, when Sābūr placed the crown on Hurmuz’s head, the great men of state came into his presence and invoked blessings on him. He returned a kindly answer to them, and they then realized from him the [real] truth of the affair. He behaved benevolently toward them, meted out justice to the subjects, and followed the [praiseworthy] ways of his forefathers, and he laid out the district (kūrah) of Rām Hurmuz.129 Hurmuz’s reign lasted one year and ten days.130

[Bahrām I]

After him, there succeeded to the royal power his son Bahrām (I). He was Bahrām, son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak.131

129. A town of southeastern Khūzistān, in early Islamic times a flourishing market town and in the modern period a center for the oil industry. It was clearly an old town, though little mentioned by the historians. The Pahlavi town list confirms al-Ṭabari’s information here that it was founded by Hormizd I, son of Shābūr I [Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 19, 95–96], but some sources, e.g., Ḥamzah al-Ḵisfahānī, 43, attribute it to Ardashīr I. See Marquart, Erānshahr, 145; Le Strange, Lands, 243–44; Schwarz, Iran, 332–33; Barthold, Historical Geography, 194; EP, sv. Rām-Hurmuz (V. Minorsky and C. E. Bosworth).

130. Hormizd I Ardashīr’s reign was 270–71. Hormizd’s name appears on his coins as WHRMZDY. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian coins, 33, 322–33, 419, Plate V, Table III; Gobl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43, Table II, Plate 3; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 84–85; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 654; al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾriḵh, I, 187 [extremely brief]; al-Dinawarī, al-Aḥkām al-tiwāl, 47 [mainly on his execution of Mani, thus attributed to Hurmuz]; al-Masʿūdī, Murūd, II, 166–67 = §5393 [his counsels to his commanders]; idem, Tanbih, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Ḵisfahānī, 45 [notes his considerable gifts, but that he fell short of his father]; Ibn al-Ṯahir, Kāmil, I, 388–89. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabari-Balʿami, trans. II, 85–89.

For recent studies on Hormizd’s reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 102, 226–28; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 127–28, 178; Morony, EP, s.v. Sasānīds.

131. MP Warahhrān, Wahrām, Greek Ouvararanēs, Baramas, etc., Syriac Warathrān, from the name of the Avestan god of victory Varōthraghna. See Nöldeke,
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

After the demise of 'Amr b. 'Adî b. Naṣr b. Rabî'ah, the governor for Sâbûr b. Ardashîr, and for Hurmuz b. Sâbûr, and for Bahrâm [b. Hurmuz] b. Sâbûr, over the frontier region of [the land of] the Arabs of Rabî'ah, Mudar, and the rest of the tribes in the deserts of Iraq, Ḥijâz, and Jazîrah,132 was at that time a son of 'Amr b. 'Adî called Imru' al-Qays al-Bad'. He was the first of the kings from the house of Naṣr b. Rabî'ah and the governors for the kings of the Persians who became a Christian.133 According to what Hîshâm b. Muḥammad [sc., Ibn al-Kalbi] has mentioned, he ruled over his charge as a vassal prince for 114 years, comprising twenty-three years and one month under Sâbûr, son of Ardashîr, one year and trans. 46 n. 3; Justi, Namenbuch, 361–65; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 926; Elr, s.v. Bahrâm, heading.

132. This enormous sphere of control and influence attributed to the early Lakhmid governors is vastly exaggerated, since their authority as representatives of imperial Persia was mainly exercised along the Syrian Desert fringes of Mesopotamia and in northeastern Arabia, and only sporadically within the Arabian interior. The two great tribal groups of Rabî'ah and Mudar dominated northern Arabia, with members of their component tribes pushing northward through Iraq into Jazîrah, where the names of their dwelling places and pasture grounds, the Diyar of Rabî'ah, Mudar, and Bakr, reflect their presence in early Islamic times. See EP2, s.v. Rabî'a and Mudar [H. Kindermann]. It was, however, true that elements of the South Arabian Lakhm had spread from their original home quite early in the pre-Islamic period not only into Iraq but also into Syria. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 246, II, 54–56, 375–76; EP, s.v. Lakhm [H. Lammens-Irfan Shahid].

133. al-Bad', "the first, the originator." This is Imru' al-Qays [I], the famous "Imru' al-Qays, King of all the Arabs" of the proto-Arabic al-Namârah tomb inscription of 328, al-Namârah being situated in the district of al-Ṣafâ' between Damascus and Boṣrâ in what was then the Roman province of Arabia. In explanation of the apparent paradox why this Lakhmid king in al-Ḥīrah should have been buried far from his homeland of the desert fringes of Iraq, Irfan Shahid has plausibly suggested that Imru' al-Qays was the first of his line to become a Christian and therefore deserted his allegiance to the Zoroastrian Sâsânids and went over to the Romans in Syria, becoming one of their client rulers; also, he may have been affronted by Shâbûr II's campaign against the Arabs of eastern Arabia [see al-Ṭabarî, I, 838–39, pp. 54–56 below], which challenged his own claim to the headship of all the Arabs, however inflated this might have been [see n. 132 above]. Nöldeke, tr. 47 n. 2, denied that Imru' al-Qays al-Bad' could have been a Christian, in the light of the vigorous paganism of later Lakhmid kings, and thought that al-Ṭabarî's source Ibn al-Kalbi had here confused this Imru' al-Qays [I] with a later one of the same name. But Nöldeke was writing before the discovery of the Namârah inscription in Syria at the end of the nineteenth century. See Shahid's detailed discussion of the king and his inscription, in Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 31–47, and also Rothstein, Lähmiden, 52, 55ff., 61, 63–64, 139.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

According to what has been mentioned, Bahram b. Hurmuz was a forebearing and mild person, so that the people rejoiced when he came to power. He behaved in a praiseworthy manner toward them, and in his policy of rule over the people followed the practices of his forefathers.

According to what has been mentioned, Mānī the Zindiq summoned him to his religion. So Bahram enquired exhaustively into Mānī's beliefs, and found that he was a propagandist for Satan. So he ordered him to be executed and his body to be skinned and stuffed with straw, and then for it to be hung from one of the city gates of Junday Sābūr, which is [because of this] called Mānī's Gate. He also killed his followers and those who had joined his faith. Bahram's reign lasted, according to what is said, for three years, three months, and three days.

---

134. A total, in reality, of forty-five years, four-and-a-half months (but Shābūr I's reign is usually taken as thirty or thirty-one years, as in al-Ṭabarī, I, 831, p. 39 above). Also, Bahram I was the son of Shābūr I, not of Hormizd I, and Bahram II was the son of Bahram I, hence Hormizd I's nephew and not his son.

135. The date of Mani's execution is controversial, and its exact placing is bound up with uncertainty over the chronology of the early Sasanid rulers. See n. 56 above, and, specifically, with the dates for Bahram I's brief reign, during which it appears Mani was killed. Hence the chronology for the dating of Shābūr I's death, Hormizd I's reign, Bahram I's reign, and Bahram II's accession proposed by Henning is followed here (see nn. 122, 130 and 134 above, and nn. 136-37 below). Basing himself on the dating of 271-74 for Bahram I's reign and on evidence from a wide range of sources, including Manichaean ones, Henning suggested that Mani may have been executed on Monday, the 4th of the Babylonian month of Addaru in the year 584 of the Seleucid era = 2 March A.D. 274; but he allowed the possibility of divergent dates, such as a date in A.D. 277 proposed by S. H. Taqizadeh. See Taqizadeh and Henning, "The dates of Mani's Life," 505-20 and especially 515-20. See also for further suggestions regarding the date, such as that of 276, W. Hinz, "Mani and Kardēr," 490-92; Widengren, "Manichaeism and Its Iranian Background," 971-72.

136. Bahram I's reign was 271-74, but very little is known about his reign. His name appears on his coins as WRHR'N. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 53-54, 324-25, 419-22, Plates V-VI, Table III; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43, Table II, Plate 3; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 86-87; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233. The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbi, Ta'rikh, I, 183 (on his relations with Mani, and his execution of him); al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 47 (lists his name only); al-Mas'ūdi, Murūj, II, 147-
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

[Bahram II]

Then there succeeded him in the royal power his son Bahram [II]. [He was] the son of Bahram [I], son of Hurmuz [I], son of Sābūr [I], son of Ardashir [I]. He is said to have been knowledgeable about the affairs [of government]. When he was crowned, the great men of state called down blessings on his head, just as they had done for his forefathers, and he returned to them greetings in a handsome manner and behaved in a praiseworthy fashion toward them. He was wont to say: "If fortune furthers our designs, we receive this with thankfulness; if the reverse, we are content with our share."

There are varying reports about the duration of his reign. Some say that he ruled for eighteen years, others for seventeen years.¹³⁷

¹³⁷ Bahram U's reign was 274-91. His reign was a troubled one, although few details of its events are known. There was the lengthy rebellion of his brother Hormizd centered on Sijistān, so that the Romans were able to take advantage of Bahram's preoccupation with the east of his realm and invade Mesopotamia, an attack on Ctesiphon only being averted by the death in 283 of the Roman emperor Carus. Bahram II's name appears on his coins as WRHR'. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 54-55, 326-34, 422-25, Plates VI-VIII, Table IV; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43-45, Tables III-IV, Plates IV-V; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 88-92; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182 [name and length of reign only]; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 47 [name only]; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 168-74 = §§595-99 [lengthy entry: stresses Bahram's life of pleasure and neglect of state affairs]; idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Īsfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 46; Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 390. Of Persian sources, see Ṣamandār Bāl'āmī, trans. II, 89-90. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 226-27; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 127-28, 178; EP, s.v. Sāsānids [M. Morony]; Elr, s.v. Bahram I (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

Bahram was a fervent Zoroastrian and was strongly under the influence of Kerder, whom he regarded as his mentor and on whom he bestowed the title of "Saviour of Bahram's soul"; also, Kerder appears on all but one of Bahram's numerous rock reliefs with the sovereign himself [see Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 98-99, 106]. In the previous reigns of Shābūr I and Bahram I, Kerder had had to share royal patronage and favor with the prophet Mani. Now, with the advent of Bahram II, as Hinz has pointed out, the balance tipped definitely in Kerder's favor, and some two years into the new reign, Mani was arrested and died in imprisonment [see n. 135 above]. With Kerder's ascendancy now complete, non-Zoroastrian faiths within Persia came under attack, as is seen in his Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription, where it is stated that Kerder humbled, among others like the Manichaean
Then there reigned Bahram (III), who had the honorific title of Sakānshāh.\[138\] He was the son of Bahram [II], son of Bahram [I], son of Hurmuz [I], son of Sābūr [I], son of Ardāshir [I]. When he was crowned, the great men of state gathered together around him, and called down on his head blessings for the auspiciousness of his rule and for his long life, and he returned to them greetings in a handsome manner. Before he had succeeded to the royal power, he had been appointed ruler of Sijistān. He reigned for four years.\[139\] and Jews, the “Nazarenes” [Jewish Christians?] and the Kristīyān [mainstream, Catholic, Nicene Christians?] [the exact definition of the latter two terms is disputed; thus Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 203, following Brock, “Christians in the Sasanian Empire,” 3, 6, and n. 21, assumes a distinction based on territorial-cultural origins, so that “Nazarenes” = the indigenous Persian Christians, and Kristīyān = the Christian deportees from lands further west and their descendants]; the Chronicle of Arbela has some mention of persecutions during Bahram’s reign. It seems to have been the Jews who, in practice, suffered the least molestation. See; Chaumont, “Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l’Empire iranien,” 187–97; J. Neusner, “Jews in Iran,” 914–15.

Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 227–31; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 128–29, 178, Ep, s.v. Sāsānids [M. Morony]; Elr, s.v. Bahram II [A. Sh. Shahbazi].

138. al-Ṭabarī’s text has Shāhānshāh “Supreme king,” but as is apparent from the words at the end of this section on him, this is an old misreading; the correct reading appears in Ḥamzah al-ʾIṣfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 46, and al-Khwārazmī, Majāth al-ʾulūm, 102. Sakān Shāh means literally “king of the Sakas,” i.e., of the people controlling or inhabiting Sakastān/Sagastān, Islamic Sijistān, Sistān; see Ep, s.v. Sistān [C. E. Bosworth]. Bahram III had acquired his post during his predecessor’s reign, following the early Sāsānīd practice of granting out provincial appanages to royal princes; in this case, he was appointed to Sāgastān because of its importance as a bastion against powerful peoples of the eastern fringes, such as the Sakas and Kushans, or because it had recently been conquered by Bahram II after the revolt there of his brother Hormizd (n. 137 above). Agathias says that it was the custom of the Persian kings, when they had subdued a land or people, to give their sons titles expressing dominion over that people. See Nöldeke, trans. 49 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 228–29; Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 122–23, 143; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 128–29.

139. Bahram III’s reign was for four months only in the early part of the year 292 until he was deposed after a revolt by his great-uncle Narsh [see below]. Coins attributed to Bahram’s name are exiguous in number, and the readings of their legends are ambiguous, with coins variously assigned to him and to his successor Narsh. See on these Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 56, 334–35, 425–26, Plate VIII, Table V; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 93–94; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 234.

The other Arabic sources on his reign, all very laconic (with al-Dinawari omitting him altogether), are Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 655; al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 182; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 174 = § 600; idem, Tanbih, 100, trans. 144; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābāk

[Narsi]

Then there took charge of the royal power after him Narsi, son of Bahram (I) and also the brother of Bahram (II).140 When he was crowned, the nobles and great men of state came into his presence and called down blessings on him. He gave them promises of benevolence and adjured them to aid him in the business of ruling. He behaved toward them in a highly just manner. On the day he became king he said, "We must never lose an opportunity in giving thanks to God for His bountifulness to us." He reigned for nine years.141

I, 391. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 231; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 129, 178; EI², s.v. Sasanids [M. Morony]; EI³, s.v. Bahram III [O. Klima].

140. The name Narseh, Greek Narsēs, Narsaios, goes back to Nairyōsānha, the name in the Avesta of the messenger of Ahura Mazdā. See Justi, Namenbuch, 221–25; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 678. Narseh was actually yet another son of Shābūr I, hence brother of Bahram I, uncle of Bahram II and great-uncle of Bahram III. Cf. Nöldeke, tr. 50 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 231; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 129, 178; EI², s.v. Sasanids [M. Morony]. Only in al-Maṣʿūdī, Murūj, II, 238 – § 660, quoting from Abū 'Ubaydah's history of Persia, taken from 'Umar called Kisrā (?), is the correct filiation "Narsi, son of Sābūr [I]" given in the other Arabic sources, for which see n. 141 below.

141. Narseh's reign was 292–302. His name appears on his coins as NRSHTY. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 56, 335–36, 426–28, Plate VIII, Table V; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 45, Table V, Plate 5; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 95–96; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 234.

Narseh had become "High King of Armenia" on his father Shābūr I's death. The story of his eventual achievement of the throne and the setting aside of Bahram III; the enumeration of local kings or princes on the fringes of the Sasanid empire who were presumably tribute to him; and the exposition of his concept of his own royal power, are set forth in the inscription [NPI] which he had carved on the commemorative tower built by him at Paikuli in Kurdistan. He also made known his feeling that his legitimate right to the throne after Hormizd Ardashir's death had been usurped by the succession of the three Bahramīs, by altering Bahram II's investiture relief at Bishāpūr and substituting his own name for that of his elder brother; and he added to the relief the prostrate figure of a vanquished foe under the monarch's horse [this enemy being probably the noble Wahnam who had organized the putsch in Fārs raising Bahram III to the throne]. See E. Herzfeld, Paikuli. Monument and Inscriptions of the Early History of the Sasanian Empire, I, 94–
Then there ruled Hurmuz (II), son of Narsi, son of Bahram (II), son of Bahram (I), son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sabur (I), son of Ardashir (I). The people had been in awe of him, and had experienced harshness and severity [from him]. But he told them that he had been fully aware of their fears over his severity and strong rule, and informed them that he had exchanged the roughness and harshness in his nature for mildness and clemency. He then ruled them in the most considerate fashion and behaved in the most equitable manner possible. He was eager to succor and revive the weak, to render the land prosperous and flourishing, and to spread justice among the subjects. Then he died without leaving any son. The people were distressed at that and, because of their favorable feeling for him, they asked about his wives and were told that a certain one of them was pregnant. Others have said, moreover, that Hurmuz had entrusted the royal power to that unborn child in his mother’s womb, and that the woman in question gave birth to [the future] Sābūr (II) Dhu al-Aktāf (“The Man with the Shoulders”). Hurmuz’s tenure of royal power, according to what some authorities say, was six years and five months, but according to others, seven years and five months.\textsuperscript{144}

\textbf{[Sābūr II Dhū al-Aktāf]}

Then there was born Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf, son of Hurmuz (II), son of Narsī, son of Bahrām (II), son of Bahrām (I),\textsuperscript{145} son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashir (I), who succeeded to the royal power by virtue of the testament of his father Hurmuz’s appointment of him as his successor.\textsuperscript{146} The people rejoiced at his birth; they spread the news about it to the farthest lands, they wrote letters and the couriers of the postal and intelligence system (\textit{al-burūd}) conveyed news of it to the most distant regions and frontiers.\textsuperscript{147} The viziers \textsuperscript{144} Hormizd II’s reign was 302-309. His name appears on his coins as ‘\textit{WHRMZD}’. See on his coins Paruck, \textit{Sāsānian Coins}, 57-58, 337-41, 428-30, Plates VIII-IX, Table VI; Göbl, \textit{Sasanian Numismatics}, 45-46, Table V, Plate 5; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, \textit{An Introduction to Sasanian Coins}, 21, 97-98; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Coins,” 234.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, \textit{Ma’ārif}, 655; al-Ya’qūbi, \textit{Ta’rikh}, I, 182 [name and length of reign, death while Sābūr (II) was still a baby]; al-Dinawarī, \textit{al-Akhbār al-fiwdl}, 47 [information that he died when his wife was several months pregnant; the succession of his putative son was confirmed by placing the crown on his wife’s abdomen, a tale known also to Western historians such as Agathias, see Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 122-25, 144; al-Mas'ūdi, \textit{Muṣūj}, II, 174 - § 600; idem, \textit{Tanbih}, 100, trans. 144 [name and reign only]; Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, \textit{Ta’rikh}, 47 [he founded a \textit{rustaq} in the Rām-Hurmuz district]; Ibn al-Athir, \textit{Kāmil}, I, 391-92. Of Persian sources, See Ṭabarī-Bal’āmī, trans. II, 90-91. Of modern studies, see Nöldeke, trans. 51 nn. 1, 2; Christensen, \textit{Sasanides}, 233-34; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians,” 131-32, 178; \textit{EP}, s.v. Sāsānids [M. J. Morony].

\textsuperscript{145} For the correct filiation here, see p. 45 n. 134 above.

\textsuperscript{146} Concerning the folkloric touch of Hormizd’s entrusting the royal power to his infant Shābūr while he was still in his mother’s womb, aside from the fact that he could not have known the sex of the child at that point, the ascertainable historical facts are that Hormizd left several sons by various wives, all older than Shābūr. The great men of state and the Zoroastrian priesthood saw their chance of securing a dominant influence in affairs, hence killed the natural successor to power, Hormizd’s eldest son Adhar Narseh, blinded another, forced a third to flee to Roman territory, and then raised to nominal headship of the realm the infant Shābūr, born forty days after his father’s death. See the references in n. 144 above, and \textit{Elr}, s.v. Ardašīr II [A. Sh. Shahbazi].

\textsuperscript{147} The institution of a state-organized postal and intelligence network was an ancient Near Eastern one, known in Persia from as far back as Achaemenid times and in such neighbors of the Sāsānids as the Romans and Byzantines. While there is and secretaries retained the official functions they had held during his father's reign. They continued in these positions until news about them (sc., about these officials) spread, and there was disseminated on the distant frontiers of the land of the Persians [the news] that the people there had no king and that the Persians were merely waiting for a child, [at that time] in the cradle, not knowing how he would turn out. Hence the Turks\textsuperscript{148} and the Romans cast envious eyes on the lands of the Persians.

Now the lands of the Arabs were the nearest ones to Fārs,\textsuperscript{149} and these Arabs were among the most needy of all the nations for something to provide them with daily sustenance and with lands, because of their wretched condition and the harshness of their way of life. So a great horde of them crossed the sea from the region of the lands of 'Abd al-Qays, al-Bahrayn, and al-Kāzimah, until they set up military encampments against \textit{(anākhā ʿālā)}[the town of] Abruwān, on the shores that had Ardashīr Khurrah as their hinterland \textit{(sawāhil Ardashīr Khurrah)} and in the coastlands \textit{(asyāf)} of Fārs.\textsuperscript{150} They seized the local people's herds of cattle, their cultivated lands, and their means of subsistence, and did a great deal of damage in those regions.

They (sc., the Arab invaders) remained engaged in these activities for a considerable time, with none of the Persians able to launch a counterattack because they had set the royal crown on the head of a mere child and because of people's [consequent] lack of awe and respect for him. [This continued] until Sābūr grew up and became stirred to action. When he was grown up, the first thing that was manifested of his good management of affairs and his acute understanding, so it has been mentioned, was that he was awakened from sleep one night, toward early morning, in the royal palace at Ctesiphon, by the anguish clamor of the people. He enquired what that was, and was told that it was the clamor of the people crowded together on the bridge over the Tigris, coming and going. So he gave orders for another bridge to be built, so that one of the bridges could be used for people crossing in one direction and the other bridge for people crossing from the opposite direction;
thus people using the two bridges would no longer be crowded together. When the people perceived the acuteness of his mind in of eastern Najd, and accounted genealogically as part of Rabī‘ah. They early migrated toward the western shores of the Persian Gulf, to Qatif and Bahrayn, which, as al-Ṭabarī shortly relates (I, 838–39, pp. 54–56 below) were from Shābūr II's time directly under Persian rule, with garrisons and governors, and then made over to the Persians' representatives, the Lakhmids. The 'Abd al-Qays were thus well placed, under the stimulus of inadequate resources for supporting them in the oases of the eastern Arabian coastlands, to make incursions across the gulf to the coast (ṣif, pl. asydf) of Fars. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 168, II, 28–29, 127; EP, s.v. 'Abd al-Qays (W. Caskel); Els, s.v. 'Abdal-Qays (P. Oberling). Al-Kāzimah was a place on the Bahrayn coast south of the mouth of the Shatt al-'Arab but not further specified. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, III, 1109–10; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 431.

The reading of the name rendered here as Abruwān (tentatively translated by Nöldeke, trans. 53, as Rishahr, on which see al-Ṭabarī, I, 820, p. 16 and n. 62 above) vary greatly in the mss. Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, II, 347–48, have suggested that this is the town of *Abruwān mentioned by al-Ṭabarī,
I, 870, p. 105 below, as being in the province of Ardashīr Khurrah and as a place where Mīhr Narsi erected lofty buildings [see p. 105 n. 267 below, for varying suggestions about this place-name]. Also, Altheim and Stiehl have suggested, as certainly seems appropriate in the context, that one should follow ms. C's reading anākhā 'alād, "they set up encampments against . . . " [thus likewise in the Cairo edition, II, 55, apparently following here the Constantinople/Istanbul ms.], instead of the text's weaker anākhā bi-, "they halted at . . . " [cf. Dozy, Supplément, II, 734, on anākha 'alād: "se présenter hostilement devant une place ou un homme"]).
working out a solution for this problem, despite his tender years, they rejoiced at this, and hastened to fulfil what had been commanded regarding this [construction of the new bridge]. It is mentioned that the [second] bridge was constructed in the vicinity of the existing bridge before sunset of that day. In this way, the people were relieved of the necessity of endangering their lives when crossing the bridge. The child [Sabür] grew in stature and prestige in that single day, what for others would have taken a long period.

The secretaries and viziers began successively to lay before Sabür various state matters. Among the matters they brought to his notice was the position of the troops along the frontiers and those directly facing enemies there, for news had arrived that the greater part of them had been reduced to a sorry state. The secretaries and viziers stressed to him the seriousness of the situation, but Sabür told them, “Don’t worry about this excessively, since the remedy for it is simple.” Then he ordered a letter to be sent to the whole of these troops, stating that he had learned about how long they had been stationed in those regions of the provinces where they were, and about the intensity of their deprivation of their dependents and brothers.\[151\] Hence whosoever wished to return to his family was free to do so, with full permission for that; and whosoever wished to complete the rest of his service by remaining steadfast in his post, that would be reckoned to him favorably. He further ordered that those who chose to return could remain with their families on their own lands until the time when they were needed again. When the viziers heard all these words of his, they approved of them highly and said, “Even if this youth had had long experience of state affairs and the management of troops, his judgment and the soundness of his eloquent speech could not be greater than what we have just heard!”

\[151\] Complaints about the long periods of service along distant frontiers, entailing separation from homes and families, were among the accusations hurled two centuries or so later at Khusraw II Abarwēz by his own son and supplanter Sherōy, see al-Ṭabarî, I, 1047, p. 383 below. Also, in early Islamic times complaints about this process, called in Arabic \textit{tajmîr} (literally, “bringing together, collecting,” i.e., of troops in garrisons, with the Arab warriors or \textit{muqāṭilah} being stationed on the inhospitable fringes of what is now Afghanistan, were a powerful factor in the revolt of ‘Abd al-Rahmān Ibn al-Ash‘āth and the “Peacock Army” in 81–82/700–701 which nearly toppled the Umayyad government. See \textit{EP}, s.vv. Ibn al-Ash‘āth \cite{vaglieri} and Tağmîr \cite{bosworth}.
Then there were issued successively his instructions to the provinces and the frontier lands, which gave heart to his own troops and humbled his enemies. At last he reached sixteen years of age and was able to bear weapons and ride cavalry horses, and his physical strength became great. He summoned together the commanders of his guards and troops and made an oration to them. He mentioned how bountiful God had been to him and to them through his forefathers, what these last had accomplished through their good conduct and how they had crushed their enemies, and how all these achievements of theirs had, however, fallen into confusion in the period that had elapsed during his youth. He then told them that he was going to make a start on the work [of restoring the position] by securely defending the heartland; and that [after that] he was making plans to move against one of his enemies and make war on him, and that he was going to take with him a force of one thousand warriors only. The assembled people rose up, calling down blessings [on him] and expressing their thanks, but asking that he should remain in his place and send forward in his stead the commanders and troops on this expedition he had planned.

He rejected their request, however, that he should stay in his capital. Then they requested him to increase the number [of troops] he had mentioned, but again he refused. [On the contrary,] he selected one thousand cavalymen from among the stoutest and most heroic of the troops. He commanded them to go forward and accomplish his design and forbade them to spare any of the Arabs they encountered or to turn aside in order to seize booty. Then he led them forth, and fell upon those Arabs who had treated Fārs as their pasture ground while they were unaware, wrought great slaughter among them, reduced [others of] them to the harshest form of captivity, and put the remainder to flight.

Then he crossed the sea at the head of his troops and reached al-Khaṭṭ. He marched through the land of al-Bahrayn, killing its people, not letting himself be bought off by any kind of payment and not turning aside to take plunder. He went back on his tracks and reached Hajar, where there were Bedouins from the tribes of 152. Reading here wa-harraba.

---

153. That is, the western Persian Gulf coastland, of what is now Kuwait, Qatar, and eastern Saudi Arabia, the term appearing in Syriac sources as Hagar; it was also Tamīm, Bakr b. Wā'il, and 'Abd al-Qays. He spread general slaughter among them, and shed so much of their blood that it flowed like a torrent swollen by a rainstorm. Those who were able to flee realized that no cave in a mountain nor any island in the sea was going to save them.

After this he turned aside to the lands of the 'Abd al-Qays and destroyed all the people there except for those who fled into the desert sands. He passed on to al-Yamāmah, where he made general slaughter like that of the previous occasion. He did not pass by any of the local Arabs' springs of water without blocking them up, nor any of their cisterns without filling them in. He approached the neighborhood of Medina and killed the Arabs whom he found there and took captives. Then he turned aside to the lands of the Bakr and Taghlib, which lie between the land of Persia (mamlakat Fārs) and the frontier fortresses (manāzir) of the Romans in the land of Syria. He killed the Arabs he found there, took captives, and filled in their water sources. He settled members of the tribe of Taghlib, who were in al-Bahrayn, at Dārīn and al-Samāḥi, and at al-Khaṭṭ, members of the 'Abd al-Qays called al-Bahrayn [(in this sense comprehending both the island and the adjacent mainland) in early Islamic times and, right up to modern times, al-Abāsa' or al-Ḥabsa’. See Nöldeke, trans. 56 n. 1; EI², s.v. al-Hasā’ (F. S. Vidal). For al-Khaṭṭ, see n. 64 above.]

154. An extensive region of eastern Arabia, with several important oases, running westward to the scarp of the Jabal Ṭuwayq and eastward to the Dāḥnā’, i.e., comprising much of the modern Saudi provinces of al-Riyāḍ, al-Khārj, and al-ʿĀrid. At the beginning of the Islamic period, Yamāmah was the home of the semi-Christianized Bānū Ḥanīfah and the epicenter of activity by the rival prophet to Muhammad, Musaylimah. See EI¹, s.v. al-Yamāmah (A. Grohmann).

155. Sing. manṣarāh, literally “look-out posts,” largely synonymous with the more common term for these frontier guard stations, maslaḥa, pl. masāḥīḥ.

156. Taghlib b. Wā’il were an important tribe of the Rabī‘ah group who lived in Najd till their defeat in the famous “War of Basūs” (early sixth century), and already within the sphere of the Sāsānids and their Lakhmid allies, as Shābūr’s policy here shows. When the Lakhmids regained control of al-Ḥirah after the interlude of Kindah control there in the 520s, the considerably Christianized Taghlib became one of the firm supports of Lakhmid power there. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 163, II, 27–28, 541–42; EI², s.v. Taghib b. Wā’il [M. Lecker].

The mediaeval geographers were confused and vague about these places in al-Bahrayn. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 432, Dārīn was either on Bahrayn island or on the nearby Persian Gulf coast. Concerning Samāḥi, see al-Bakri, Mu‘jam, III, 754, IV, 1382: “a place in al-Bahrayn belonging to the ‘Abd al-Qays” (but in Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 432, an island in the gulf). Al-Ṭabarî’s text here, Dārīn wa-ismuhā and some groups of the Banū Tamīm in Hajar; and those members of the Bakr b. Wā'īl who were in Kirmān (the so-called Bakr Abān) and those of them from the Banū Ḥanẓalah at al-Ramaliyyah in the province of al-Ahwāz.

He gave orders for the building of a city in the Sawād, which he called Buzurj Sābūr, [that is, Ukbarā, and another city which he

---

Hayj, is disturbed, and should should be corrected to Dārin wa-Samāhij in the light of the parallel passage in Ibn al-'Adīm’s Bughyat al-ṭalab. It is not surprising that Nöldeke, trans. 57 n. 2, was unable to find anything about a putative place called Hayj. In fact, we have here reference to two distinct places. Dārin was the main town of the island of Tarut, still known today as such and lying in the bay off the eastern Arabian coast near the modern towns of al-Qatif and al-Dammām. Samāhij was a village on the island of al-Muḥarraq lying just off the northern edge of the main al-Bahrayn island (and now linked to it by a causeway), it was mentioned around this time as the seat of a Nestorian Christian bishopric. See the detailed discussion of these place-names by Joëlle Beaucamp and Chr. Robin, “L’évêché nestorien des Māšmahīg dans l’archipel d’al-Bahrayn [Ve–IXe siècle],” 171–96; D. T. Potts, The Arabian Gulf in Antiquity, II, 151–52.

157. Bakr b. Wā'īl were also a tribe of Rabi'ah, originally nomadizing in the Yamāmah region, but, also like the Taghlīb, migrating northward to the desert fringes of the lower and middle Euphrates. Hence they came into contact with the Lakhmids, especially after Taghlīb moved on again into Upper Mesopotamia, and began to clash with the rival pastoralists of Tamīm, a discord subsequently reflected in the events leading up to the skirmish of Dhū Qār (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1030, pp. 359–60 below). Several leading poets of Bakr, including Ūrāfa b. 'Abd, al-Ḥārīth b. Ḥillīzah, and al-'A'shā Maymūn, came within the cultural ambit of the Lakhmīd court. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 162–66, II, 22–23, 223; EP, s.v. Bakr b. Wā'īl [W. Caskel].

Abān was a place in eastern Fārs, lying to the southeast of Yazd in the district of Rūdhān, and is now the modern town of Anār. See Nöldeke, trans., 57 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 286; Schwarz, Iran, 21, 191–92.

158. Hanẓalah b. Mālik were a subdivision of the great tribe of Tamīm b. Murrah or Ma’add, forming the main group within its branch of Zayd Manāt. Tamīm’s center was in Yamāmah, where they were rivals and opponents of the Rabi’ah tribes of Taghlīb and Bakr. Tamīm in general had close connections with the Sāsānids and Lakhmīds, cooperating with the Persian authorities in Hajar and policing trade routes across central Arabia to Yemen for the above two powers. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 59, 68, 72–73, II, 7–10, 298; EP, s.vv. Hanẓalah b. Mālik [W. Montgomery Watt] and Tamīm b. Murra [M. Lecker].

Al-Ramaliyyah may well be the Qaryat al-Ramāl of subsequent Islamic times situated in western Khūzistān, between Qurqūb and the Nahr Tirā on or near the Karkhā affluent of the Kārūn. In the later third/eighth century, it was the scene of amphibious operations led by the Regent al-Muwaffaq against the Zanj rebels, according to al-Ṭabarī, III, 1952–53, tr. P. M. Fields, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XXXVII, The ‘Abbāsid Recovery. The War against the Zanj Ends, 17–18. See Nöldeke, trans. 57 n. 4; Schwarz, Iran, 368.
called Fayrūz Sābūr, that is al-Anbār.\footnote{The interpolated words were supplied by Nöldeke; see text, n. e, and trans. 57 n. 5. ‘Ukbarā, Syriac ‘Okbarā, was a town on the east bank of the Tigris above Ctesiphon, famed for its gardens and vineyards. Arabic authorities like Ibn Khur-radādbih, Ḥamzah al-‘Isfahānī and Yaqūt confirm that its Persian name was indeed Buzurg Shāpūr. See Yaqūt, Buldān, IV, 142; Le Strange, Lands, 50–51. Anbār (for which, see n. 77 above) was doubtless meant as one of the fortified points in the belt of strongholds and garrisons (masāliḥ) protecting the Sawād, and would have had Arab auxiliaries planted along this line as frontier guards, the equivalent of the \textit{limitanei} of the Romans and Byzantines on the opposite, western side of the Syrian Desert. Not mentioned by al-Tabarī but known from other Arabic sources, e.g., al-Baladhuri, \textit{Futūḥ}, 298, is the defensive trench and rampart, the \textit{khandaq} Sābūr, which the Sasanid ruler had dug out from Hit in the north to al-Kāzimah, south of where the Islamic \textit{mīr} of al-Baṣrah was later to be laid out. See Altheim and Steihl, \textit{Die Araber in der Alten Welt}, II, 349–50; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 138.} He further founded in the province of al-Ahwāz two cities, one called Iran-Khurrah-Sābūr, which means “Sābūr and his land,” and which is called in Syriac al-Karkh, and the other al-Sūs, a city he built at the side of the fortress that has within it a sarcophagus containing the corpse of the prophet Dāniyāl (Daniel), may God pray over him and grant him peace.\footnote{The text is somewhat disturbed here, as pointed out by Altheim and Steihl, \textit{Die Araber}, II, 352. The definition “Sābūr and his land” must in reality go with Iran-Shahr-Sābūr, this being the first of Shabur’s two foundations; the second, Iran-Khurrah-Sābūr, must be Sūs, especially as Ḥamzah al-‘Isfahānī, 47, specifically equates Khurrah Sābūr with al-Sūs. We thus have Iran-Shahr-Sābūr = Karkh, and Iran-Khurrah-Sābūr = Sūs. Both towns lay in the ancient region of Susiana. Al-Karkhay[ah] (Syriac \textit{karkh} = “fortified town”) appears in the Eastern Christian sources as Karkhā dha Lēdhān or Rēdhān, and was the seat of a Nestorian bishop; it was situated near Susa/al-Sūs, with its present site marked by the ruins called locally Aywān-i Karkh. See Yaqūt, Buldān, IV, 449; Marquart, \textit{Ērānsahr}, 145; Le Strange, Lands, 240; Barthold, \textit{Historical Geography}, 185; Markwart-Messina, \textit{Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals}, 97; Altheim and Steihl, op. cit., II, 353–55; \textit{EP}, s.v. \textit{Karkha} (P. Schwarz-A. Miquel), \textit{Elr}, s.v. Ėrān-Xwarrah-Šābūr (Rika Gyselen).} He led an expedition into the land of the Romans, took a great number of prisoners there, and then planted [them] in the city of Iran-Khurrah-Sābūr, which the Arabs called al-Sūs after shortening the name. He gave orders also for the building of a city in Bā Jarmā, which he called Khuni, which he laid out as an administrative region (kūrah) and for the building of a city in the land of Khurāsān, which he named Naysābūr and likewise laid it out as an administrative region.

Sābūr had made a truce with Ḥusānṭīn (Constantine), the King of the Romans, the one who built Constantinople and who was the first king of the Romans who became a Christian. Ḥusānṭīn died, and his kingdom was divided between three of his sons, who also died, so that the Romans appointed as their king a man from Ḥusānṭīn’s house named Lulyānūs (Julian[us]), who was an adherent of the religion of the Romans that had prevailed before Christianity. He used to conceal this, and ostensibly follow Christianity before he became king, but when he actually came to power he openly proclaimed his adhesion to the religion of the [ancient] Romans, restored it in its former state, and gave orders for its revival. He commanded that the churches should be pulled down,十一

161 On Shābūr’s deportations and plantations of prisoners of war, see Nöldeke, trans. 59 n. 1; EIr, s.v. Deportations. ii. In the Parthian and Sasanian Periods (E. Ketterhofen), at VII, 299.

162 Text, j.ni, thought Nöldeke though that the whole name was dubious. For Bā Jarmā, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 827, p. 32 and n. 98 above.

163 Naysābūr, the Arabised form of MP Nīw-Shābuhr, NP Nikū Shābūr Nīshābūr, less correctly Nīshāpur, “fair [city] of Shābūr.” Some sources attribute its foundation to Shābūr I, e.g., Ḥamzah al-İsfahānī, Ta’arīkh, 44, presumably to be considered as part of his consolidation of power in the realm described in al-Ṭabarī, I, 819–20, pp. 14–15 above. Others attribute its foundation to Shābūr II, and if he was its founder, this action may have been part of his activities in the East against the “Kushans,” Cuseni, which are poorly documented but which apparently fell within the 350s or 360s while Shāpūr was also disputing control of Armenia with the Romans. What may have happened was a rebuilding by Shābūr II of his great-grandfather’s original foundation. See in addition to the references in n. 59 above, Yāqūt, V, 331–33; Nöldeke, trans. 59 n. 3; Marquart, Erānšahr, 50; R. Chirshman and T. Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 70–74.

164. Constantine the Great [r. 324–37]. See on him PW, IV/1, s.v. Constantinus (der Grosse) [Benjamin].

165. Julian the Apostle [r. 361–63], successor to Constantine I’s second son Constantine II, was actually the son of a half-brother of Constantine the Great. See on him PW, XI/1, s.v. Iulianus [Apostata] [E. von Borries]. The rendering here with initial l- stems from a Syriac form of the name, see Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 1, who also in 59 n. 4 points out that the following information is of no historical value, but must stem from the Syriac romance of the Emperor Julian, see his “Über den syrischen Roman von Kaiser Julian,” 291–92 [see on this romance p. 63 n. 173 below].
down and that the bishops and learned scholars of the Christians should be killed. He assembled contingents of the Romans and Khazars,¹⁶⁶ and of the Arabs who were within his kingdom, in order to use them for making war on Sābūr and the armies of Persia.

The Arabs seized that opportunity as an occasion for revenge on Sābūr for his killing the Arabs. One hundred and seventy thousand Arab warriors were gathered together in Lulyānūs's army.¹⁶⁷ The latter sent them forward under the command of one of the Patri¬cians of the Romans called Yūsānūs (Jovian[us]),¹⁶⁸ whom he placed in charge of his vanguard. Lulyānūs marched on until he

¹⁶⁶. Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 2, thought that this anachronistic mention of the Turkish Khazars was an interpolation in the text of al-Tabari's source, since the Khazars do not firmly appear in Middle Eastern history till the early seventh century, when they were allies of Byzantium against the Persians in Transcucasia; see EP, s.v. Khazar (W. Barthold and P. B. Golden). Shahid has suggested, in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 116 n. 38, that al-Tabari's "Khazars" were probably Goths (an important auxiliary element in the Roman forces at this time, the same nation whom Ammianus Marcellinus (see below, n. 167) calls "Scythians"), but this seems unlikely. It is admittedly true that the Scythians, the original Goths, and the Khazars all inhabited the South Russia—lower Volga basin region.

¹⁶⁷. The undeniable, if in many ways obscure, Arab dimension to Julian's short, eighteen-months' reign, has been considered in close and perspicuous detail by Shahid in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, especially at 82–86, 110ff. and 132–37, depending, on the classical side, on such sources as the Latin historian Ammianus Marcellinus's Res gestae, the Greek Libanius's Orations and some church historians. Julian's own attitude toward the Arabs was somewhat ambiguous, but became generally hostile: he himself describes them as lēstas "robbers," echoing Ammianus's stigmatizing of them as a natio perniciosa. But here it is very probably the Sarakenoi, the nomadic Arabs of the desert interiors of Syria, Palestine, Sinai, and Egypt who are envisaged; whereas, the Romans' prime contact with the Arabs was with the sedentary or semisedentary ones of the borderlands between the desert and the town, the foederati or confederates, many of them Christianized, those who at the time of the Arab conquests are described in the sources as musta'ribah. Shahid argues that Julian failed to make the best use of the Arab auxiliary element in his forces when he thrust through the northern part of the Syrian Desert via his concentration point at Callinicum (the later Islamic al-Raqqah) across the Euphrates at Ctesiphon. For the Arabs were familiar with the terrain, as well as with the Middle Eastern climate, whereas the Roman troops were more used to fighting in the temperate climes of Europe and the Mediterranean basin. Also, whereas many elements back in Rome were lukewarm about the Persian campaign, arguing that the threat from the Goths was a more imminent one than that from the Persians, the Arabs were, as al-Tabari notes, eager to take vengeance for Shābūr's savage treatment of their compatriots in eastern Arabia.

¹⁶⁸. The Syriac form of Jovian's name, according to Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 4.
reached the land of Persia. When Sābūr got news of the magnitude of Lulyānūs’s army—Romans, Arabs, and Khazars—he became alarmed, and sent out spies to bring back to him information about the size of their forces and their state of fighting spirit and effectiveness for wreaking damage. But the reports these spies brought back to him concerning Lulyānūs and his troops were at variance with each other. Hence Sābūr disguised himself and went along with a group of some men from his trusty entourage to see for themselves the opposing army. When he drew near to the army of Yūsānūs, the commander of Lulyānūs’s vanguard, he sent forward a small group from those accompanying him to Yūsānūs’s army, in order that they might ferret out information and bring back to him authentic reports. However, the Romans became aware of them, seized them, and brought them back to Yūsānūs. Not one of them confessed the purpose for which they had gone out to Yūsānūs’s army except for one man, who told Yūsānūs about the whole affair, exactly as it was, and where Sābūr was, and who asked Yūsānūs to send back with him a detachment of troops so that he might bring Sābūr back to them. But when Yūsānūs heard this story, he sent to Sābūr one of his own close intimates who would tell him what Yūsānūs had learned about Sābūr’s position and warn him. Sābūr accordingly rode away rapidly, back to his own army. The Arab troops in Lulyānūs’s army asked him for permission to launch an attack on Sābūr and he acceded to their request. So they advanced toward Sābūr, fought with him, routed his force and wrought great slaughter among them. Sābūr fled, together with what remained of his army, and Lulyānūs took possession of Sābūr’s seat of power, the city of Ctesiphon, and seized Sābūr’s stores of wealth and treasuries there.¹⁶⁹

¹⁶⁹. Julian’s army advanced into Persian Mesopotamia in spring 363 and won a great victory over Shābūr outside Ctesiphon. Al-Ṭabarī emphasizes the outstanding role of the Arab auxiliary troops here, presumably as mounted lancers within the cavalry division of the army, whereas Ammianus Marcellinus does not mention it. Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 117, notes the Latin historian’s dislike of the Arabs, and thinks that the truth may be somewhere in between the two partisan viewpoints; for Nöldeke, however, trans. 61 n. 1, the emphasis on the Arab role was a later addition to the story by an Arab hand concerned to vaunt the exploits of his nation. Despite the victory in the field over the Persian army, Ctesiphon resisted a siege by the Romans (pace al-Ṭabarī’s information here that it was captured), and in June 363 Julian and his forces turned Sābūr at that point sent letters to those elements of his army in distant regions, telling them what he had suffered at the hands of Lulyānūs and his Arab contingents, and he ordered all the commanders there to hasten back to him with the troops of his army under their command. Very soon, armies from all quarters of the land had gathered round him. He then marched back again, attacked Lulyānūs, and recovered from him the city of Ctesiphon. Lulyānūs encamped with his army at the city of Biḥ-Ardashīr and in the region nearby. Envoys were at this point going backward and forward between him and Sābūr. One day, however, Lulyānūs was seated in his chamber when a stray arrow, from an invisible hand, struck him in the heart and killed him.

The hearts of his troops were thrown into perturbation, and they became fearful because of what had happened to him. They fell into despair about extracting themselves from the land of Persia. They coalesced into an advisory council, with no king or leader, and asked Yūṣānūs if he would take over the business of ruling, and they would accordingly raise him to the throne. He refused this, however, and when they pressed him, he told them that he was a Christian and that he would not rule over a people who were opposed to him in religion; but the Romans told him that they were really Christians too, and that they had only concealed this in fear of Lulyānūs. So he agreed to their request, and they made him their king and publicly displayed their Christian faith.

back toward Antioch. Al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tīwāl, 50, states that Julian’s army occupied the city of Ctesiphon but were held up outside its citadel (qaṣr), with Julian killed by a stray arrow in the course of the siege.

170. That is, Seleucia, the Bihrāsīr of al-Ṭabārī, I, 819, p. 15 above.

171. The circumstances of Julian’s sudden death in June 363 were mysterious. Contemporaries were unsure whether he was killed, as al-Ṭabārī says, by a stray arrow or lance thrust, or whether he was struck down by an assassin; and if the latter, was the murderer in the pay of the Persians or one from Julian’s own troops? The possibility that the assassin was an Arab and that it was the result of a grudge against the emperor (since according to Ammianus, Julian had withheld the Arab troops’ pay) is discussed by Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 124–31.

172. On Julian’s death, the Roman troops offered the imperial crown first to the Praetorian Prefect Salutius Secundus, who refused it, and then to the commander Jovian. See E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, I, 169–71.
Sābūr came to know about Lulyānūs's death, and sent a message to the commanders of the Roman army in which he said, "God has brought you into our power and has made us to prevail over you, in return for your violence towards us and your trampling over our land. We hope that you will perish there from hunger without our having to wield a sword against you in battle or to point a spear at you; but dispatch to us a leader [to treat with us], if you have appointed a leader over yourselves." Yūsānūs resolved to go to Sābūr, even though none of his army commanders agreed with his judgment in this. Nevertheless, he insisted on following his own view here and went to Sābūr with a guard of eighty of the noble warriors from his camp and from his army, and wearing his crown. Sābūr received news of his coming; he went out to meet him, and each of them prostrated themselves before the other [in obeisance], and then Sābūr embraced Yūsānūs out of thankfulness for what he had previously done for him (i.e., letting him escape back to his camp). He feasted with Sābūr that day and felt at ease. Sābūr sent a message to the commanders of the Roman army and their leaders informing them that, if they had raised to power anyone except Yūsānūs, their destruction in the land of Persia would have ensued, and that their appointing Yūsānūs as their king had [alone] preserved them from his violence. Yūsānūs's prestige became strong through his action [on this occasion].

Sābūr continued: "The Romans have launched attacks into our land and have killed a great number of people. They have chopped down date palms and other trees in the Sawād, and have ruined its agricultural prosperity. So either you must pay us the full value of what you have destroyed and ruined, or else you must hand over to us, in recompense for all that damage, the town of Niṣībīn and its surrounding region." Niṣībīn had previously been part of the kingdom of Persia, but the Romans had then conquered it. Yūsānūs and the leading commanders of his army agreed to Sābūr's demand for reparations, and handed over Niṣībīn to him. The people of Niṣībīn heard about this, and emigrated from there to various cities in the Roman empire, fearful of their safety under the power of a king opposed to their own religion (sc., to Christianity). When news of this reached Sābūr, he transferred twelve thousand persons of good lineage from among the people of Iṣṭakhr, Iṣbahān, and other regions of his country and his provinces, to Niṣībīn, and settled them there. Yūsānūs returned with his troops to Roman territory, where he reigned for only a short time and then died.\textsuperscript{173}

Right up to his death, Sābūr became occupied with great eagerness in killing the Arabs and tearing out the shoulder-blades of their leaders; this was why they called him Dhū al-Aktāf “The Man of the Shoulders.” Certain of the historians (ahl al-akhbār) mention that after Sābūr had wrought great slaughter among the Arabs and had expelled them from the regions they had entered, namely the lands adjoining Fārs, al-Bāhrayn and al-Yamāmah,\textsuperscript{174} he went down into Syria and proceeded to the frontiers of the Roman empire.\textsuperscript{175} He explained to his companions that he intended to enter the territory of the Romans in order to find out \textsuperscript{173} Jovian died at Dadastana in central Anatolia en route from Antioch to Constantinople, thus terminating his brief reign of slightly more than six months (363–64). See on him PW, IX/2, s.v. Iovianus (Seeck). It seems quite likely that many Christians did flee from Nišibin before the Persians and that Shābūr did resettle Persians from the interior of his kingdom in this strategically placed city of Nišibin. The infusion of a Persian ethnic element there helps perhaps to explain the city’s preference thereafter for the Persian connection. Jovian’s action in making peace with Shābūr enabled the Roman army to withdraw intact, but at the price of the cession of Nišibin, Singara (Sinjār), and the territories in Upper Mesopotamia conquered by Diocletian more than sixty years before. The peace treaty was, however, regarded by contemporaries in the Roman empire as a dishonorable one. Agathias expressed this view when he called it “a shameful and disgraceful truce, so bad that it is even now (i.e., ca. 570) harmful to the Roman state”; see Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 124–25, 146. From this time onward, Nišibin was to be the great bastion of Persian arms against Roman and Byzantine attacks and pressure from the west, and was never to return to Christian control.

The preceding story of the Roman-Persian warfare during Shābūr’s reign is paralleled in the account of these events in the Syriac romance of the Emperor Julian, an original Syriac work and not a translation from Greek, probably written in Roman-held Edessa. Nöldeke thought that it was directly or indirectly known to the Arabs, since al-Ṭabarî’s account, derived from Ibn al-Kalbî, accords in general with the romance, especially in such episodes as Julian’s being killed by a stray arrow, Shābūr’s secret visit to the enemy encampment and his personal understanding with Jovian. See his “Über den syrischen Roman von Kaiser Julian,” 263–92.

\textsuperscript{174} This is a sketchy and not very accurate résumé of Shābūr’s campaigns in eastern Arabia in the year 326 already described by al-Ṭabarî, I, 836–37, pp. 51–52 above.

\textsuperscript{175} The following story apparently contradicts the previous narrative of the warfare of Julian and Jovian with Shābūr, but is in Nöldeke’s view, trans. 64 n. 2, really a genuine Persian recounting, not of events in the time of Shābūr II but of those in the time of Shābūr I (see al-Ṭabarî, I, 826–27, pp. 28–31 above), the captured Qaṣṣar being, of course, Valerian.
their secrets and to acquire information about their cities and the numbers of their troops. Accordingly, he entered Roman territory and wandered about there for a considerable period of time. News reached him that Qaysar had given a great feast and had ordered all the people to be gathered together to attend his feast. Sābūr set out, therefore, disguised as a beggar, with the aim of attending that gathering, so that he might thereby see Qaysar, familiarize himself with his appearance, and discern how he behaved at his feast. But his identity was discovered; he was arrested and Qaysar gave orders for him to be wrapped in a bull’s hide.

Qaysar now traveled with his troops toward the land of Persia, bearing with him Sābūr in that condition. He made extensive slaughter and destroyed many cities and villages, and cut down date palms and other trees until finally he came to the city of Junday Sābūr. The local people had fortified themselves in it, but Qaysar set up ballistas (majāniq) and demolished part of the city. While matters stood thus, the Roman guards entrusted with watching over Sābūr were negligent one night. There were some prisoners from al-Ahwāz in his vicinity, so he instructed them to pour oil from nearby skins on to his bonds. They did this; the ox hide became soft, and he wriggled out of the bonds. He then slipped quietly away until he drew near to the city gate. He told the city guards who he was. When he came out among its people, they were overjoyed at seeing him. Their voices were raised in praise and invocations to God, to such an extent that Qaysar’s troops woke up at the sound of the voices.176

Sābūr gathered together all those who were in the city, provided them with weapons and equipment, and marched out against the Romans that very same night toward the morning. He killed the Romans, took Qaysar captive and seized as booty his treasuries.

176. The whole story of Sābūr’s foray into the Roman camp, his capture, and escape, is part of a well-known topos, that of the prince slipping behind enemy lines in disguise for spying purposes. Nödeke, trans. 65 n. 1, cites such a role being ascribed to Alexander the Great in the Alexander Romance, the legendary biography of the emperor by Pseudo-Callisthenes (whence taken over by Firdawsī into the Persian epic) [see Nödeke, “Beiträge zur Geschichte des Alexanderromans,” 1–56], to a Roman emperor, probably Galerius [r. 305–11] by Synesius, and here to Shābūr, being taken, as already noted, from the Syriac Julian Romance.
and his womenfolk. Then he loaded Qayṣar with iron fetters and required him to restore to prosperity all that he had ruined. It is said that Sābūr required him to bring earth from the Roman lands to al-Madā'in and Junday Sābūr, so that he might thereby restore what he had destroyed, and to plant olive trees in place of the date palms and other trees he had chopped down. Then he cut off Qayṣar’s heels, sewed them up, and sent him back to the Romans on an ass with the words, “This is your punishment for your crimes against us.” Because of that, the Romans abandoned the use of straps over the heels (i.e., for shoes and sandals) and sewed up the parts of the shoes hanging down over the feet.177

Sābūr remained in his kingdom for a considerable time, and then he led an expedition against the Romans. He killed many of them and took many captives. He settled these last in a city he built in the vicinity of al-Sūs and called it Irānshahr-Sābūr. Then he sought peace with the Arabs, and settled some tribes of Taghilib, ‘Abd al-Qays, and Bakr b. Wā’il in Kirmān, Tawwaj,178 and al-Ahwāz. He built the city of Naysābūr and other cities in Sind and Sijistān.179 He had a physician brought from India and established him at al-Karkh by al-Sūs; when this man died, the people of Sūs

177. Nöldeke observed in his text, n. b, that he had not correctly understood this last sentence when he made his translation, 66. Other Arabic sources, including Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿarif, 657–58, and al-Masʿūdī, Murād, II, 181–83 = §§ 605–606, 608, give the story of Sābūr’s spying mission, his capture, his being sewn up in a bull’s hide, and his escape. This last historian, ibid., II, 184 = § 607, gives the story of Sābūr’s mutilation of the captured Qayṣar in a slightly different form: that he shod with iron the Roman’s feet after cutting his Achilles tendons and cauterizing his heels, which is why the Rūm subsequently did not shoe their horses with iron or themselves wear boots with heels (al-khīfāf al-muʿaqqabah).

178. Tawwaj or Tawwaz was an ancient town, the Taokē mentioned in the itinerary of Alexander’s Indian campaign and in the classical geographers. It lay in western Fārs on the Shābūr river about midway between Kāzarūn and the Persian Gulf shore. In early Islamic times it was an important center of the textile trade, but in later mediaeval times it fell into ruins, and its exact site is now unknown. See Yaqtū, Būldān, II, 56–57; Le Strange, Lands, 259–60; Schwarz, Iran, 66–68; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 74–75; Markwart-Messina, A Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 94–95; Barthold, Historical Geography, 163; El, s.v. Tawwadj [C. E. Bosworth].

179. It is unlikely that Shābūr could have built cities in a frontier province like Sijistān, disputed with the Sakas and their epigoni, and almost impossible that he could have constructed any in the Indian province of Sind, at this time under local Brahman rulers.
holders of power after ardashir b. bābak

inherited his medical skill, and for this reason the people of that region are the most expert of medical practitioners among the Persians. Shābūr bequeathed the royal power to his brother Ardashir (II). Sābūr's reign lasted seventy-two years.

180. Although the Arabic sources mention an Indian connection for the foundation of medical studies as Sus and Jundayshabur, it is difficult to discern any factual basis for this beyond a general belief in early Islamic society that Indian physicians were especially skillful, a belief that was perpetuated because of the infinitesimal number of Indian physicians known against which the belief could be tested (but cf. the story given by al-Tabari, III, 747–48, of Hārūn al-Rashīd's summoning from India the physician Mankah to treat an obstinate illness). Much clearer than Indian influences are the undoubted Hellenistic ones brought by persons resettled in Khuzistān from the Byzantine lands and by Nestorian Christian immigrants, who brought the traditions and techniques of the medical schools of Antioch and Alexandria. See EP, s.v. Gondeshapur (Aydı'n Sayılı).

181. Shābūr II's reign was 309–79. Shābūr's name appears on his coins as ШHPW-

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 656–59; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, I, 182–83 [his raids on and violence against the Arabs, and his wars with the Romans]; al-Dinawarī, al-Akhdar al-tīwāl, 47–51 [a very detailed section: the raids into Jazīrah and the Sawād by a Ghassānīd king [cf. Shahīd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 117], Shābūr's attacks on al-Ḥāḍr, his war with Julian [here called Mānūs!] and acquisition of Niṣībīn, and his urban foundations]; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 175–89 – §§ 601–11 [much detail on the attacks of the Arabs on Iraq and Shābūr's revenge, his adventures in Rūm and his plantation of Byzantine captives in Khuzistān]; idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Īṣfahānī, Ta'rikh, 47–48 [his raids on the Arabs, his being captured while spying in Rūm, his captivity, his gaining of Niṣībīn, and his building works]; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 392–97. Of Persian sources, see Šābār-Bal'amī, trans. II, 91–102. Of modern studies on Shābūr II's reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 234–53; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 224; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 132–41, 178; EI, s.v. Shābūr (V. F. Büchner); EP, s.vv. Sāsānids [M. J. Morony], Šābūr (C. E. Bosworth).

Nöldeke, trans. 68 n. 1, noted that the Arabic and Persian sources used by al-Ṭabarī and other Islamic writers mention nothing of Shābūr's persecutions of the Christian community in Persia and, to a lesser extent, of the Jews and Manicheans. The great sufferings of the Christians are, however, known to us from the Syriac Acts of the Martyrs and from such works as Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History. Thus in 341 the Catholicos in the see of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (whose primacy had only become established with difficulty in the mid-fourth century), Simon Bar Šābba'ē, was martyred after he had protested his inability to burden his indigent community with the capitation tax at double rate in order to finance Shābūr's wars with the Romans/Byzantines; and two years later, Narsēs, the metropolitan of Bēth Garmāyē, was arrested and executed. Given that Shābūr was During the reign of Sābūr, his governor over the desert fringes of Mudar and Rabī’ah was Imru’ al-Qays al-Bad’ b. ‘Amr b. ‘Adī b. Rabī’ah b. Naṣr, and then Sābūr appointed over the latter’s governorship his son, ‘Amr b. Imri’ al-Qays, according to what has been mentioned. He remained in the office for the remainder of Sābūr’s reign, the whole of his brother Ardashir (II), son of Hurmuz (II) b. Narsi’s reign and part of that of Sābūr (III), son of Sābūr (II). The total length of his governorship over the Arabs, as I have just mentioned, and his exercise of authority over them, amounted to thirty years, according to Ibn al-Kalbi.

Then there took charge of the royal power, after Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktaf, his brother Ardashir.

[He was] the son of Hurmuz (III), son of Narsi, son of Bahrām (II), son of Bahrām (I), son of Hurmuz (I), son of Ardashir (I), son of Bābak. After he was crowned, he sat there [to receive] the great men of state. When they came into his presence, they prayed for his victoriousness and conveyed thanks to him for his brother Sābūr. Ardashir replied to them enthusiastically and told them about the warm place in his heart for their thanks to him regarding his brother. When he was securely on the throne, he turned his attention to the great men and the holders of authority, indeed much involved with warfare against the Christian Romans/Byzantines, a political element was doubtless at work here, but the king is known to have hated the Christians and to have been a keen enforcer of Zoroastrian orthodoxy within his dominions. Christians could not accept elements like the sun, earth, and fire as objects of cultic reverence, and found such Zoroastrian practices as marriage within close degrees of relationship as equally abhorrent. Shābūr’s reign was the worst thirty or forty years or so that the Christians of Persia had to endure, and the total ruin of Christianity within Persia was only averted by his death and the succession of kings who either did not wish to continue his policy or did not have the means to do so. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l’empire perse, 20–25, 43–82; J. P. Asmussen, “Christians in Iran,” 936–39. Shābūr’s reign concomitantly saw a rise in power and prestige of the Zoroastrian priesthood, whom a strong monarch like Shābūr could afford to cultivate and shower with favors.

182. The middle and later decades of the fourth century are an obscure period in the history of the Lakhmids. See Rothstein, Lahymiden, 41ff.
and killed a great number of them. The people then deposed him from power after a reign of four years.183

[Sābūr III]

Then there assumed the royal power Sābūr.
He was the son of Sābūr (II) Dhu al-Aktāf, son of Hurmuz (II), son of Narsi. The subjects rejoiced at his accession and at the return of his father's royal authority to him. He met with them in the most handsome way possible, and wrote letters to the provincial governors enjoining them to good conduct and to kindness with the subjects, and he ordered the same thing to his viziers, secretaries, and court entourage, and addressed them in eloquent terms. He continued to behave justly to his subjects, showing compassion to them because of the love, affection, and obedience they clearly bore him. His paternal uncle, the deposed Ardashir (II), behaved submissively toward him and vouchsafed obedience to him. But the great men of state (al-'uzāmā') and the members of noble houses (ahl al-buyūtāt) cut the ropes of a large tent Sābūr had had erected in one of his palace courts, and the tent fell down on top of him [and killed him]. He had reigned for five years.184

183. Ardashir II's reign was 379-83. As Nöldeke, trans. 69 n. 2, remarked, Ardashir must have been an old man when he came to the throne, since he was only slightly younger than his half-brother Shabur II, and he lived on into the next reign of Shabur III (see below). Ardashir had been a governor at Hajab in Adiabene for Shabur I, and his depiction of himself in the Taq-i Bustan rock reliefs, together with his brother, as subduers of a slain Roman emperor (possibly Julian; see R. Sellheim, "Taq-i Bustan und Kaiser Julian (361-363)," 354-66), implies that he participated in Shabur's wars with the Romans. Al-Ṭabarî's information that Ardashir slaughtered many of the nobility points to his being a strong personality who continued Shabur's policy of firm rule. Ardashir's name appears on his coins as 'RTH9TR. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 59, 352-53, 435-36, XII, Table VIII; Göhl, Sasanian Numismatics, 47, Table VII, Plate 7; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 104-105; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

184. Shabur III's reign was 383-88. As Nöldeke, trans., 70 n. 2, observed, the
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

[847]

[Bahrām IV]

Then there assumed the royal power after him his brother Bahrām IV.

[He was] the son of Sābūr (II) Dhu al-Aktāf, and had the title of Kirmān-Shāh, since his father Sābūr had made him governor of Kirmān during his own lifetime. He wrote a letter to his army commanders urging them to obedience and adjuring them to fear God and to furnish sound advice to the king. At Kirmān he built a city. He governed his subjects in a commendable fashion and was praised for his rule. His reign lasted eleven years. A group of murderous evildoers rose up against him, and one of them killed him by shooting an arrow at him.

briefness of the reigns of Shabur III and his two successors, as well as their violent ends, show that this was a “time of troubles” for the Sāsānīd state, with enfeeblement of the crown and aggrandizement of the nobility. It was fortunate for the Persians that Rome was largely preoccupied with the Goths; the readjustments to the frontiers between Persian-protected Armenia and the smaller, Roman-protected part were achieved peacefully in the reigns of Shabur III and Bahrām IV. Shabur’s name appears on his coins as SHPWHR. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānīan Coins, 59–60, 3534–56, 437–40, Plate XII, Table IX, Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 47–48, Table VII, Plate 8; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 106–107; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 235.

The other Arabic sources on Shabur’s reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma’ārif, 659, al-Ya’qūbī, Ta’rīkh, I, 183 (his death under the collapsing tent), al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, II, 189 = § 611 (his wars against the Arabs of Iyād and other tribes; a confusion with the activities of Shabur III); idem, Tanbih, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 48; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 397–98. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal’āmī, trans. II, 89. For recent studies on his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 256–57, 259; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 141, 178.

185. It nevertheless seems more probable, as already noted by Nöldeke, trans. 71 n. 2, that Bahrām was a son of Shabur III.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma’ārif, 659; al-Ya’qūbī, Ta’rīkh, I, 183 (his pursuit of justice and good rule); al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 51 (makes him the direct successor of his father Shabur II) [recte III]; al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, II, 190 = § 612; idem, Tanbih, 101, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta’rīkh, 48 (a proud, harsh ruler, negligent of his subjects’ welfare); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 398. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal’āmī, trans. II, 90–91. Of modern studies on his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 253–54, 269; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 142–43, 178, Efr, sv. Bahrām IV [O.
Then there assumed the royal power after him Yazdagird (I). He had the epithet of "The Sinful One" (al-Athīm), and was the son of Bahram (IV), who was called Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf. Some of the scholars knowledgeable about the genealogies of the Persians say [on the other hand] that this Yazdagird the Sinful One was the brother of Bahram, who had the title Kirmān-Shāh, and not his son, and they state that he was Yazdagird, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf. Among those who attribute this filiation to him and assert this, is Hishām b. Muḥammad [sc., Ibn al-Kalbi].

According to what has been mentioned, he was rough and harsh and possessed many defects. One of the worst and most serious of these last, it is said, was that he did not use his keenness of intellect, his good education, and the wide-ranging varieties of knowledge he had thoroughly mastered in their proper place, and also his extensive delving into harmful things and his use of all the powers he possessed for deceiving people, using his sharpness, wiles, and trickery—all this together with his keen mind, which had a propensity toward evil-doing, and his intense enjoyment in employing these faculties of his. Also, he scoffed at and poured scorn upon other people's knowledge and cultural attainments, counting them as of no account, and he paraded at length before people his own achievements. In addition to all that, he was ill-natured, of the town Bahram built [when he was governor?] survives today as the small town of Kirmānshāh to the south-southeast of Yazd (and perhaps survives also in the name of the better-known Kirmānshāh of western Persia, cf. Nöldeke, trans., 71 n. 3).
bad morals, and of depraved propensities, to the point that his bad nature and violent temper made him consider minor lapses as great sins and and petty slips as enormities. As a result, no one, whatever close relationship he might have with him, ever dared to intercede on behalf of a person who had offended him in the slightest way. He was suspicious of people for the whole period of his life, and trusted no one in any thing whatever. He would never recompense anyone who had done a good service, but if he conferred the most exiguous benefit on a person, he made that out to be a great favor. If anyone was bold enough to speak to him over some matter which another person had already spoken to him about, he would say to him, "The person on whose behalf you have spoken to me, how much did he give you, or how much have you already received from him?" Only delegations of envoys coming to him from the rulers of the various nations could speak with him on these things and similar topics. His subjects could only preserve themselves from his harshness and the affliction of his tyranny, and from the tout ensemble of his evil defects, by holding fast to the good customs of the rulers before his period of power and to their noble characters. They could only band together and help each other in the face of his reprehensible conduct and fear of his harshness. It was part of his policy that he should punish anyone guilty of an error in regard to him, or who had committed an offense against him, with such a severe penalty that the sum stipulated could never be gathered together by the offender in the space of three hundred years; and for the same reason, such a person would never be beaten with a number of lashes without expecting further punishment later on, which would be even more unpleasant. Whenever he received a report that one of his entourage had shown especial favor toward one of those dependent on him, or whom he had encouraged and patronized (min ahl šinā'atihi), or one of those of equal social standing ([min ahl] ṭabaqatihi), he sent him away from his service.191

190. A recognition, if evidence were necessary, of the antiquity in Persian life of the tradition of offering presents, pīshkash, in return for expected favors from a superior. See EP, s.vv. Hiba. iv. Persia (H. Busse), Pishkash (A. K. S. Lambton).

191. The universally black picture of Yazdagird in the Islamic sources depending on the Persian historical tradition has been seen by modern scholars as the
When Yazdajird had achieved power, he had appointed as his vizier Narsi, the outstandingly wise man of his age; Narsi was perfect in manners and education, excellent in all his conduct, and the preeminent figure among the men of his time. They used to call him Mihr Narsi or Mihr Narsih, and he had the by-name of al-Hazarbandah. The subjects hoped that his policies and his abilities would take away some of Yazdajird’s [bad] characteristics and that Narsi would have a beneficial effect on him. But when Yazdajird became firmly established on his throne, his contempt for the reflection of a struggle between the king and such powerful and ambitious classes in the state as the nobility and the Zoroastrian priesthood. Nöldeke, trans. 74 n. 3, added as a counterbalance to this image, promulgated by aristocratic and clerical circles, the very favorable image of the king in contemporary Christian sources, and other faiths such as Judaism seem to have enjoyed more freedom during his time. According to one story [not, however, very probable], he married Shōshendukht, daughter of the Rēsh Gālūthā, the Jewish Exilarch; see Neusner, “Jews in Iran,” 915. While Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 143–44, states that not all Christian sources are eulogistic, and there was some persecution toward the end of his reign, he does agree that Yazdagird was, in comparison with earlier emperors, tolerant toward minority faiths in Persia, even if this may have involved an element of Realpolitik, in that he sought the maintenance of peace and good relations with the Romans. One source optimistically states that Yazdagird was on the verge of becoming a Christian himself. Agathias calls Yazdagird “friendly and peaceable,” a ruler who never once made war on the Romans, see Cameron, “Agathias on the Sassanians,” 126–27. Procopius likewise praises Yazdagird’s peace policy and retails the colorful story that the Roman emperor Arcadius (r. 383–408) entrusted his young son, the future Theodosius II, to Yazdagird’s guardianship. See The Persian Wars, I,1.1–10; Garsoian, “Byzantium and the Sassanians,” 578–79; Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 133–54. Also, it was during Yazdagird’s reign, in 410, that the first synod of the Nestorian Church on Sasanid territory was held, under the headship of the Catholicoes Mār Ishāq of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, and a hierarchy of metropolitan bishoprics, headed by Seleucia-Ctesiphon, set up. See Labourd, Le Christianisme dans l’empire perse, 87–109; Asmussen, “Christians in Iran,” 939–40; E12, s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony), Eir, s.v. Christianity. I. In Pre-Islamic Persia [J. R. Russell], at V, 525.

192. Literally, “having or commanding a thousand slaves,” see Justi, Namensbuch, 128. Mihr Narsēh was from one of the noblest families in Persia, the Spendiyārs; for his genealogy, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 868–69, pp. 103–104 below. See on him Nöldeke, trans., 439, and Lukonin, “Political, Social and Administrative Institutions: Taxes and Trade,” 704. That the emperor made him his chief minister immediately on his accession is improbable, as Nöldeke, trans. 76 n. 1, noted, seeing that Mihr Narsēh was active as a minister and field commander until forty years later in the reigns of Bahrām V and Yazdagird II; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 866, 868, 871, 872, pp. 99–100, 103, 106, 108 below.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

nobles and great men of state grew intense, he bore down hard on the weak, shed copious amounts of blood, and exercised power in so tyrannical a manner as the subjects had never experienced in his time. When the prominent personages and the nobles perceived that Yazdajird was only rushing further into the paths of tyranny, they came together and complained [to God] about the oppression by Yazdajird from which they were suffering. They made humble supplications to their Lord and implored Him to send them a speedy deliverance from Yazdajird.

They assert that Yazdajird was in Jurjān. One day, he looked out from his palace at a horse coming toward him, the like of whose fine appearance and perfection of form had never before been seen in a horse. It stopped at his gate. The people marveled at it because the beast was of an extraordinary nature. Yazdajird was told about it, and he then gave orders for it to be saddled and bridled. His grooms and the master of his stables all tried to do this but failed. Yazdajird was informed of the horse's refractoriness with them, so he went out personally to the spot where that horse was, placed a bridle on it with his own hand, threw a saddle blanket over its back and a saddle on top of it, secured the girth strap, and put a halter round its neck, without the horse moving an inch at any of this. Finally, he lifted its tail to fix the crupper, when the horse wheeled round behind him and struck him such a blow on the heart that he died from it. Subsequently, that horse was never seen again. It is said that the horse galloped off at a great pace, without anyone being able to catch up with it, nor could anyone ascertain the reason for its behavior. The subjects were thus freed from him and exclaimed, “This is God's work and a manifestation of His beneficence to us.”

193. That is, the region at the southeastern end of the Caspian Sea, Gurgān, OP Vākāna, classical Hyrcania. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 119–22; Marquart, Erānshāh, 72–74; Le Strange, Lands, 376–78; Barthold, Historical Geography, 88; EP, s.v. Gurgān (R. Hartmann-J. A. Boyle).

194. Following the reading of the Sprenger ms. given in Nöldeke's text, n. a, khalaṣat al-ra'īyyah minhu. The remarkable mode of Yazdagird's death is closely linked with the story in the Perso-Islamic sources concerning his evil ways, as being a fittingly mysterious end for such an impious tyrant. See Nöldeke, trans. 77 n. i.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Some state that Yazdajird reigned for twenty-two years, five months, and sixteen days, others that he reigned for twenty-one years, five months, and eighteen days.195

[The History of al-Ḥirah]

When ‘Amr b. Imri’ al-Qays al-Bad’ b. ‘Amr b. ‘Adī died during the time of Sābūr, son of Sābūr,196 the latter appointed to his office Aws b. Qal[l]ām, according to Hishām [Ibn al-Kalbi]; Aws was one of the Amalekites, from the tribe of ‘Amr b. ‘Amaliq (or ‘Imliq). But Jalḥjabā b. ‘Atik b. Lakhm rose up against him and killed him, Aws having reigned for five years.197 His death fell in the time of Bahram, son of Sābūr Dhu al-Aktāf. There was appointed to succeed him in the office Imru’ al-Qays al-Bad’,198 the son of ‘Amr b.

196. Correctly, “during the time of Sābūr [II], great-grandson of Sābūr [I].” The father of ‘Amr, Imru’ al-Qays al-Bad’, was the “King of the Arabs” of the Namārah inscription, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 834, p. 44 and n. 133 above.

197. The five years’ rule of Aws b. Qal[l]ām [fuller genealogy in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 87; . . . b. Butayn(ah) . . . b. Liḥyān al-‘Amaliqī] forms the first interregnum of Lakhmid domination in al-Ḥirah. Very little is known of Aws, whose reign must have fallen within the 380s or 390s if he died during Bahram IV’s reign, but he must have been a member of one of the leading Arab families of al-Ḥirah. It was a descendant of his, the Christian bishop of the town, Ḫabīr b. Shamʿūn, who lent the impoverished last Lakhmid king al-Nuḥmān III b. al-Mundhir IV [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1016ff., pp. 339ff. below] eighty thousand dirhams so that he could live in a royal style [see Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aḥānī, II, 26 = Aḥānī, II, 115]. If al-‘Amaliqī did occur as a tribal nisbah among the ancient Arabs, it cannot of course have had any direct connection with the Old Testament Amalekites; cf. Nöldeke, trans. 78 n. 1.

198. That is, Imru’ al-Qays [II], see Rothstein, Lahmiden, 52, 55, 58, 65. As Nöldeke, 79 n. 1, observed, it is highly improbable that two Lakhmid rulers could both have had the cognomen al-Bad’ “the first”; accordingly, we find in the text of Imrī' al-Qays [al-Bad'] (?) b. 'Amr, [who ruled for] twenty-five years; he died in the time of Yazdajird the Sinful one. The latter appointed in his stead his son al-Nu'mān b. Imri' al-Qays al-Bad'. 'Amr b. Imri' al-Qays b. 'Amr b. 'Adi, whose mother was Shaqiqah, daughter of Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān, [al-Nu'mān being], the rider of [the celebrated horse] Ḥalimah and the builder of al-Khawarnaq.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

The reason for his building al-Khawarnaq, according to what has been mentioned, was that Yazdajird the Sinful One, the son of Bahram the Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf, had [at that time] no surviving son. Hence he made enquiries concerning a spot that was healthy and free from diseases and maladies. As a result, he was directed to the elevated region of al-Ḥīrah, and he sent his [subsequently born] son Bahram Jūr to this al-Nu'mān, ordering the latter to build al-Khawarnaq as a residence for him. He made him reside there, and instructed him to send out Bahram Jūr into the deserts of the Arabs. The actual builder of al-Khawarnaq was a man called Sinnimar. When Sinnimar had completed its construction, people were amazed at its beauty and the perfection of its workmanship. Sinnimar, however, commented, "If I had believed that you [sc., al-Nu'mān] would pay me

---

Hamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 87, the second occurrence of al-Bad' changed to [the meaningless in the context] al-Badan.

199. That is, al-Nu'mān [], called al-A'war "the one-eyed" and al-Sāhib "the wanderer, ascetic" [cf. regarding this last cognomen, p. 81 n. 217 below]. See Rothstein, Lahrīliden, 52, 55, 56, 58, 65–68; EP, s.v. Lakhmids [Irfan Shahid].

200. This famous palace of the Lakhmids would accordingly date from the first two decades of the fifth century. It lay just to the east of al-Ḥīrah, hence of the Islamic al-Najaf also, and was regarded by the early Arabs as one of the wonders of the world. The name is most probably of Iranian origin. F. C. Andreas suggested an etymology from *huwarna, "having a fine roof," but Mr F. C. de Blois has pointed out to the present writer the great unlikelihood of this, given that there is no trace of a word *warna: "roof" in Middle Persian. Al-Khawarnaq was used as a palace in early 'Abbāsid times, but later fell into ruins. Its site is visible today. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 401–403; Rothstein, Lahrīliden, 15–16; Le Strange, Lands, 75–76; Musīl, The Middle Euphrates, 35, 103–106; EP, s.v. al-Khawarnak [L. Massinon]. The story that it was built specially for the prince Bahram Gūr would be, according to Noldeke, 79 n. 3, a later suggestion.

201. Hamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 90, gives him the nisbah of al-Rūmī, "the Greek," and makes him the builder of a palace called Şinin [?]. Sinnimar's being described as a Rūmī is a reflection of the Romans' reputation as architects and fine builders. Nothing is known of the historicity of Sinnimar, see Noldeke, 80 n. 1.
the whole of my due and would have treated me as I deserve, I would have constructed a building which would have gone round with the sun, wherever it went in its course." The king then exclaimed, "So you could have built something more splendid than this, yet you didn’t do it?" and he ordered him to be thrown down from the top of al-Khawarnaq.202 It is in connection with this that Abū al-Ṭamaḥān al-Qaynī has recited.203

He paid a recompense to her and her lord, just as Sinnimar was paid a recompense—by Allāt and al-'Uzza204—the recompense which must be paid by someone seeking release from an oath.

Salīṭ b. Sa’d has likewise said,205

Abū Ghaylān’s sons recompensed him for his advanced age and his handsome behaviour just as Sinnimar was recompensed.

Also, Yazīd b. Iyās al-Naḥṣhali has said,206

May God recompense Kammāl for his most evil action with the recompense of Sinnimar, one which is paid out in full!

‘Abd al-'Uzza b. Imri’ al-Qays al-Kalbi also related poetry [with this reference].207 It happened that he gave a present of some

202. Hence “the reward of Sinnimar” became proverbial; see Rothstein, loc. cit.
203. Abū al-Ṭamaḥān Ḥanẓalah b. al-Sharıqī was a ṣu’lūk or bandit poet of the mukhaḍram. See Abū al-Faraj al-Īṣfahānī, Aghānī3, XIII, 3–14, with this verse quoted at II, 145; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 318; EI2 Suppl., s.v.
Abū ʾr-Ṭamaḥān al-Kaynī (ed.).
204. That is, the two goddesses of the pre-Islamic Arabs of Ḥijāz, who with Manāt made up the so-called Daughters of Allāh, mentioned specifically in Qurʾān, LIII, 19–20. The shrine of Allāt was at al-Ṭā’īf and that of al-ʿUzza at al-Nakhlah near Mecca. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-aṣnām, text in F. Klinke-Rosenberger, Das Heidentums3, 24, 29–45; T. Fahd, Le panthéon de l’Arabie centrale à la veille de l’hégire, 111–30, 163–83; EI1, s.v. al-ʿUzza [F. Buhl]; EI2, s.v. al-Łāt [Fahd].
205. The poet himself is obscure, but the verse is quoted in Abū al-Faraj al-
Īṣfahānī, Aghānī3, II, 145.
206. This poet is not traceable, but the Naḥṣhali were a subtribe of Dārim of Tamīm. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 60, 62, II, 8, 433.
207. The story of ‘Abd al-ʿUzza and the Ghaṣṣānīd king is given in Abū al-Faraj al-Īṣfahānī, Aghānī3, loc. cit., with the first two verses of the following poem.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

The horses delighted al-Ḥārith, as did 'Abd al-'Uzza's own presence and conversation. The king had a son who had been put out for suckling among the Banū al-Ḥamīm b. 'Awf of the Banū 'Abd Wudd of Kalb. A snake bit the son [and killed him], but the king imagined that they had fallen upon and murdered him. He said to 'Abd al-'Uzza, "Bring these fellows to me!" 'Abd al-'Uzza replied, "These are a free people, I have no superiority over them in lineage or achievements [that I might compel them to come back with me]." The king threatened, "Either you bring them to me or else I shall do such-and-such [to you]!" He replied, "We expected something as a gift from you, but we are getting punishment from you instead!" He summoned his two sons Sharāhil and 'Abd al-Ḥārith, and sent the following verses with them to his people:

208. The Ghassān were a section of the great tribal group of Asd or Azd. The tribe apparently migrated to west-central Arabia during the course of the fourth century, and the Gs'n are mentioned in a South Arabian inscription dated 470 of the Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 360–61 (on the correspondence of these eras, see n. 409 below) as located in western Najd at Sijah/Siyyan (roughly midway between Mecca and the modern al-Riyāḍ). Some of the Ghassān, though not necessarily all of them, migrated to the fringes of the Byzantine province of Arabia in the later fifth century, where they then assumed the role of frontier auxiliaries for the Byzantine emperors—a role corresponding to that of the Lakhmids for the Sāsānids on the other side of the Syrian Desert—under chiefs from the family of Jafnah. See Chr. Robin, "Le royaume huṣride, dit «royaume de Kinda» entre Ḥimyar et Byzance," 693 and n. 101, 697 n. 118, who, because of the fact that not all members of the Banū Ghassān necessarily established themselves in Syria, would prefer to style the chiefs in Syria who were allies of Byzantium "Jafnids" [see n. 211 below], a point already made implicitly by Nöldeke in the title of his pioneer monograph on the family. See in general on the Jafnid/Ghassānid chiefs at this time, Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 176,II, 31–33, 273; Nöldeke, Die Ghassānischen Fürsten aus dem Hause Gafna's, 5ff.; Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 89–91; idem, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 32–49, 61–72; EP, s.v. Ghassānids [Shahid].

The greatest of the Jafnid/Ghassānid princes, Abū Shamir al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah al-Āṣfar (r. 529–69) is here attributed to his mother, the famous Kindī princess Marīyah. According to al-Mas'ūdī, Murtūj, II, 217–§ 1079, al-Ḥārith, the son of Māriyāh Dhat al-Qurtayn bt. Arqam, was the third of the Jafnid/Ghassānid governors of Syria for the Byzantines. See EP, s.v. al-Ḥārith b. Djabala [Irfan Shahid].

209. This ancient custom of placing babies with foster mothers in the healthy environment of the desert is later seen in the infant Muhammad the Prophet's being entrusted for suckling (rīḍā') to a woman of the Sa'd b. Bakr tribe of the Hawāzīn groups outside Mecca. See F. Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 117, noting that such a custom goes back well before Muhammad's time; W. M. Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 33.
He has recompensed me—may God recompense him with the worst of His recomposes—just as Sinnimār, who was entirely innocent, was recompensed.

[It was] simply that he raised up the building over a period of twenty years long, lavishing on it repeatedly fired bricks and molten lead.

When [the king] saw that the building had reached a great height and had become like a lofty mountain with steep and difficult slopes,

It rendered him suspicious (or: he became suspicious of him) after a long period of time and after the people of East and West had shown abhorrence of him.

Sinnimār imagined that he would gain from him all sorts of joys of life and achieve a position of affection and close friendship with him.

But the king exclaimed, "Throw the barbarian (al-‘ilj)\(^{210}\) from the top of his own tower!" By God, this is one of the most remarkable affairs!

And, as you well know, I am guilty of no offense against Ibn Jafnah\(^{211}\) that could make him swear an oath [to act] against Kalb (sc., the poet's own tribe).

He will certainly seek out the heart of their lands with his cavalrymen, but—may you avoid all curses!\(^{212}\)—become free of it by your far-traveling words!

---

\(^{210}\) In its original meaning, ‘ilj means “coarse, strong, burly,” but it was applied—obviously with a deprecatory meaning—by the Arabs to non-Arabs, and especially to the Aramaic-speakers of Iraq and to the Persians. The implicit contrast is with the spare, lean Arabs, devoid of any superfluous flesh through their harsh and frugal desert way of life; cf. n. 813 below, where ‘Adi b. Zayd counsels the Lakhmid al-Nu‘mān III to impress the emperor Hormizd IV by appearing before him as a lean, half-starved, battle-hardened desert warrior.

\(^{211}\) That is, the Jafnid/Ghassānid prince referred to in the poem, the name “Ibn Jafnah” going back to the eponymous founder of the line in its original Yemen home, Jafnah b. ‘Amr Muzayqiyā b. ‘Amir. See al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, II, 182, 217, III, 391 = §§ 1037, 1079, 1276; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta‘rikh, 99; Nöldeke, Die Ghassānischen Fürsten, 6.

\(^{212}\) abayta l-la‘na, a common formula in addressing Arab chiefs and princes of the Jāhiliyyah, with the implication “may you not do anything which will merit your being cursed!” Used here, as Nöldeke notes, trans. 82 n. 5, with a contemptuous tinge to the wish. Numerous examples from early Arabic literature of its use are collected in M. Ullmann, WbKAS, II/2, 859–60.
Opposing what Ibn Jafnah has willed for himself are men who repel the perpetrator of evil from the tribe!

Already the man Harith sent before you has launched an attack on us, but he has been left mortally wounded in the lungs (literally, "afflicted by consumption") on the reddish-colored hills.

Hishām has related: This al-Nu‘mān had raided Syria many times and had brought down numerous calamities on its people, taking captives and plunder. He was one of the most violent of kings in inflicting hurt on his enemies and one of the most effective in penetrating deeply into their lands. The king of Persia had given him two corps of troops, one called Dawsar—these being from Tanūkh—and the other one called al-Shahba‘ ("the Brightly Gleaming Ones"), these being Persians. These are the two

---

213. One could also vocalize here min qibalika "on your authority."

214. Nöldeke, trans. 83 n. 3, thought that such attacks were not impossible, even within the period of general peace between Byzantium and Persia negotiated by Theodosius II and Shābūr III, but that it was more likely that a confusion has been made with the Lakhmid al-Nu‘mān II (r. ca. 499–503), who was certainly active in the Byzantine-Persian warfare in Upper Mesopotamia toward the end of the fifth century. See Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 121–22.

215. The Arabic sources mention various groups on whom the Lakhmids relied for military backing. Since they were a family in al-Ḥira ruling over a population which was in large part an urban, sedentary one, with the Tḥād different also from their rulers in their Christian faith, the Lakhmids had generally to rely on foreign or mercenary troops except when they could take advantage of tribal conflicts within Arabia and thus utilize as allies one of the tribal groups involved. As well as these two groups of the Dawsar and the Shahba‘, supplied, according to al-Ṭabari, by the Persian emperors, the sources mention other groups in Lakhmid service. These include the Waḍā‘ī (sing waḍi‘ah, "those set down, planted, mawdū‘," perhaps "garrison troops set down on the desert frontiers." or else "levied, stipulated according to an agreement," waḍi‘ah), the Ṣanā‘ī (sing. ṣanī‘ah, "creatures [of the king], those attached to his service through royal favor and patronage"); the Ṣahā‘in (sing. rahi‘ah, "pledges, hostages," taken from the nearby Arabian tribes); and others.

Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 134–38, discussed these various bodies of troops at length, and the discussion has been taken up more recently by M. J. Kister in his "Al-Ḥira. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia," 165–68, who was able to use important additional information on the Lakhmids in the British Library ms. of Abū al-Baqā’ Ḥibat Allāh al-Ḥilli’s al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah fi akhba‘ ar mulūk al-asadiyyah (since Kister wrote, available in the printed edition of Şāliḥ Mūsā Danādīkah and Muḥammad ‘Abd al-Qādir Khurayṣāt).

The Dawsar(ah), says Abū al-Baqā’, were an elite force of valiant and courageous groups known as "the two tribes." He used to raid the land of Syria and the Arabs who did not recognize his authority, by means of these troops.

Hishām related: It has been mentioned to us—but God knows best [the truth of it]—that al-Nu'mān sat one spring day in his audience chamber at al-Khawarnaq and looked down at al-Najaf, with the gardens, date-palms, orchards, and canals adjoining it, on his western side, and down at the Euphrates on his eastern side, he being on the ridge of al-Najaf.216 He was pleased with all the greenness, the flowers, and the water courses he could see, and exclaimed to his vizier and companion, "Have you ever seen the like of this view?" The vizier replied, "No; if only it were to last!" The king said, "What then endures?" He replied, "That which is with God in the next world." The king asked, "How can that be attained?" He replied, "By your abandoning this present world, by devoting yourself to God and by seeking that which is laid up with Him." So the king renounced his kingdom that very night; he put on coarse garments and left secretly in flight, without anybody knowing. The people came next morning, knowing nothing about cavalrymen. The Shahbā' were called al-Ashāhib (pl. of ashāhab, fem. shahbā', literally, "white mingled with grey," often applied to armies because of the glint of their weapons and breastplates) because of their handsomeness and splendid appearance ("the shining ones") [but according to an alternative tradition, these were a detachment of Persians, the Waḍā'i']. A third group, according to this author, were the Malḥā' (fem. of amlāḥ, "greyish, ashen colored," thus called from their grey, iron cuirasses). See al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah, 110, and cf. Kister, op. cit., 167, and Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 599–600. No source offers an etymology for the name Dawsar, but Nöldeke, trans. 83 n. 4, influenced by al-Ṭabārī's information that these were troops sent by the Persian monarch, saw clearly in it Persian du sar "having two heads," without being able to suggest any reason for this designation. One might speculate that the contingent had two component detachments, each with its own commander. Shahid, in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 29 n. 26, cf. 30, has recently suggested a possible link with the Arabian tribe Dawsar, the modern Dawāsir, whose name is enshrined in that of the Wādi al-Dawāsir in southern Najd, see EP, s.v. al-Dawāsir (G. Rentz). The question remains unresolved.

216. Al-Najaf, in Islamic times known also as Mash'ād ʿAlī from its being the last resting place of the fourth caliph, lay on the edge of the desert some six miles to the west of where the early Islamic miṣr or military encampment of al-Kūfah was to arise; nothing, however, appears to be known of the pre-Islamic history of the place or whether this history was in any way separate from al-Ḥirah. See Yaqūt, Buldān, V, 271–22; Le Strange, Lands, 76–78; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 34–35; EP, s.v. al-Najaf [E. Honigmann-C. E. Bosworth].
what had happened to him; they came to his door, but received no permission to enter into his presence, as he normally gave. When they had waited for a considerable time without this permission to enter, they made enquiries about him, but could find no trace of him.

Concerning this, 'Adi b. Zayd al-'Ibâdi says:

Consider the example of the lord of al-Khawarnaq, when he looked out one day, and he had an [inward] vision of divine guidance.

His position made him rejoice, and the great extent over which he ruled, the river [Euphrates] stretched out before him, and al-Sadîr. But his heart became troubled and he said, "What happiness can a king enjoy, when he is heading toward death?"

Then after prosperity, royal power, and ease of life, the graves have closed over them there.

Then they have become like shriveled leaves, which the east and west winds snatch away.

Al-Nu’man’s reign, up to the point when he renounced the world and wandered the earth, was twenty-nine years and four months. Ibn al-Kalbî says that fifteen years of that fell within Yazdajird’s time and fourteen years within that of Bahram Jûr.
son of Yazdajird; but as for the Persian scholars knowledgeable about their historical accounts and affairs, they relate concerning this what I am [now] about to relate.

[Bahrām V Jūr]

[He was] the son of Yazdajird the Harsh One (al-Khashin), son of Bahrām (IV) Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf.

It is mentioned that his birth took place on Hurmuzd day in the month of Farwardin at the seventh hour of the day.221 At the instant of Bahrām's birth, his father Yazdajird summoned all the astrologers who were at his court and ordered them to cast his horoscope and to explain it in such a clear way that what was going to happen to him in the whole of his life would be indicated. They measured the height of the sun and observed the ascension of the stars. Then they informed Yazdajird that God would make Bahrām the heir to his father's royal power, that he would be suckled in a land not inhabited by the Persians, and that it was advisable that he should be brought up outside his own land. Yazdajird had it in mind that he should commit the child for suckling and rearing to one of the Romans or Arabs or other non-Persians who were at his court. It now seemed best to Yazdajird to choose the Arabs for rearing and bringing him up. Hence he sumnects Bahrām's acquisition of the name with a hunting feat when he killed both a lion and a wild ass with a single arrow, see the story as given by al-Ṭabari, I, 857, pp. 85–86 below, and n. 226 below; thus the etymology from gör "wild ass" became hallowed in romance and story. Various other bases for the name have been proposed, including one from a supposed Sogdian royal title, gula, which the Indo-Europeanist Olaf Hansen thought occurred, e.g., in the name of the Hephthalite or "White Hun" ruler over northern India Mihrakula/Mihragula, r. ca. 515–44 (but of which there is actually no trace in Sogdian), and an Indian one (cf. Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 109 n. 4). In our present state of knowledge, the traditional explanation seems most feasible.

221. That is, toward midday on the Persian New Year's Day; it is emphasised in the popular romantic legends surrounding Bahrām that he was born at this most auspicious and fortunate hour and date. Firdawśi's information that he was born in the eighth year of Yazdajird's reign would make Bahrām fourteen or fifteen years old at his accession, but the statement in al-Ṭabari, I, 863, p. 93 below, that Bahrām was twenty years old when he became king seems more historically correct.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

moned al-Mundhir b. al-Nu‘mān\textsuperscript{222} and he committed to his charge the upbringing of Bahrām. He lavished on al-Mundhir signs of nobility and honour and gave him rule over the Arabs, and he bestowed on him two high ranks, one of them called Rām-abzūd-Yazdajird, meaning “Yazdajird’s joy has increased,”\textsuperscript{223} and the other called Mihisht, meaning “chiefest servant.” He also singled him out for presents and robes of honor befitting his high rank, and he ordered al-Mundhir to take Bahrām to the land of the Arabs.

So al-Mundhir went with Bahrām to his dwelling place in the land of the Arabs. He selected for suckling him three women, daughters of the nobles, with healthy bodies, keen intelligence, and acceptable education: two of them from the Arab ladies and one Persian lady. He gave orders for them to be provided with all the clothing, carpets, food, drink, and other items they needed, and they then took turns in suckling him over a period of three years.

In the fourth year, he was weaned. When he was five, he said to al-Mundhir, “Bring me knowledgeable teachers, well trained in methods of instruction, who can teach me writing, archery, and knowledge of law (fiqh; or perhaps just “intellectual skills”). Al-Mundhir replied, “You are still young in years, and the time is not yet ripe for you to embark on education. Occupy yourself with the things young children concern themselves with until you reach an age ready for being educated and for being taught good behavior; then I will appoint teachers for everything in which you have sought instruction.” But Bahrām told al-Mundhir, “By God, I am indeed young in years, but my intelligence is that of a man of adult judgment; whereas, you are old in years, yet your mind is that of a weak child. Do you not know, O man, that everything which is sought after prematurely is reached in its right time, that which is sought in its own time is reached at some other time, and that which is not sought at the right time (i.e., too late) is lost and not attained at all? I am the offspring of kings, and with God’s permission, royal power will come to me. Now the most appropriate obligation for kings and the most important thing they should see is beneficial knowledge, for this last is an adornment for them and a pillar of their royal power, by means of it they become powerful. So busy yourself and procure quickly for me the teachers for whom I have asked you!"

\textsuperscript{222} This is al-Mundhir I (r. ca. 418–62), son of al-Nu‘mān I (r. ca. 400–18), on whom see Rothstein, Lahymiden, 52, 55, 58, 69–70; for al-Mundhir’s role in Lakhmid-Persian relations and his share in the war of 421–22 between Bahrām and Byzantium, see Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 28–32.

\textsuperscript{223} This title was restored, with difficulty, by Nödeke from the mss., see text, n. b. In his trans., 86 n. 1, he noted that one would expect Rām-abzūd [for abzūd, afzūd] ba-Yazdagird and that this seems to be an isolated attestation of the epithet in the sources for Sasanid history, leading him to wonder whether its form has arisen from a misunderstanding by the older Arab transmitters/authors.

The very moment that al-Mundhir heard these words of Bahram’s, he sent envoys to the king [of Persia’s] court who would bring back to him a group of scholars of the Persians versed in law, instructors in archery and the equestrian arts, and teachers in writing and in all the share of attainments of those possessing a good education. He furthermore assembled for Bahram wise men from among those of the Persians and Romans and retellers of the stories of the Arabs. Bahram thereupon gave them binding instructions, and he appointed specific times for the specialists in each sector of those skills in which they were to come to him, and he laid down a fixed period of time within which they had to communicate to him all their appropriate knowledge. Bahram devoted his skills exclusively to learning everything that he had asked to be taught and to listening to the wise men and the transmitters of stories. He firmly comprehended everything he heard and quickly grasped everything he was taught with the minimum of tuition. It was found that after he had reached twelve years of age he had derived benefit from everything that had been taught him, had stored it all in his mind, and had surpassed his teachers and all the highly educated persons round him to such an extent that they acknowledged to him his superiority over themselves.

Bahram now expressed his gratitude to al-Mundhir and his

---

224. The Cairo text has khāṣṣatun. "and especially those knowledgeable about polite education," for Leiden's hisṣṣati.

225. Bahram’s education in both the Persian and the Arabic sciences and knightly virtues is also described, in much less detail, in al-Ya‘qūbī, Ta‘rikh, I, 183; al-Dīnawārī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 51–52; Ṭabarī-Bal’ami, trans. II, 110–12.
teachers, and commanded the latter to return home. He now ordered the instructors in archery and the equestrian arts to be present with him, in order that he might acquire from them everything requisite for him to be trained in and to achieve mastery over. Then, [after having acquired these skills,] Bahram sent for al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir and instructed him to make the Arabs come forward and bring their horses, both stallions and mares, with information on their pedigrees. Hence al-Nu'mān instructed the Arabs to do that. When al-Mundhir was informed about Bahram's intention of selecting a horse as his mount, he said to Bahram, "Don't require the Arabs to let their horses run forth [in competition with each other], but order each of them to pass in review his horse before you, and then take your pick, just as it pleases you, and tether the horse for your own use." Bahram replied, "You have spoken well; but I am the most outstanding of men in rulership and nobility, and its is necessary that my mount should only be the very best of horses. The superiority of one horse over another can only be known by trial, and there can be no trial without a competitive race." Al-Mundhir approved of his words, and al-Nu'mān ordered the Arabs to bring forward their horses. Bahram and al-Mundhir rode out to the horses assembled for the race. The horses went off from [a place which was] two farsakhs [from the winning post]. A sorrel horse of al-Mundhir's outstripped all these horses and came in first, and then the rest of them came along in successive groups, of two or three horses following each other or coming in separately or coming right at the end. Al-Mundhir led that sorrel horse over to Bahram with his own hand, saying, "May God bring you blessing by means of it!" Bahram ordered the steed to be secured for him; his joy was great, and he gave thanks to al-Mundhir.

One day, Bahram rode the sorrel horse, which al-Mundhir had given him as a mount, out hunting. He spotted a herd of wild asses, loosed an arrow at them, and rode towards them, but lo and behold, there was a lion that had seized one of the asses in the herd, and had gripped its back with its jaws in order to smash it and kill it! Bahram shot an arrow into the lion's back; the arrow pierced through its body to its belly, and then to the wild ass's back and its navel, until it ended up in the ground, penetrating into it to about a third of its length, and was fluttering there for a considerable time. All this took place in the presence of a group of Arabs and of Bahram's guards and other persons. Bahram gave orders for the episode of him, the lion, and the wild ass to be set down in picture form in one of his court chambers.\(^{226}\)

Then Bahram informed al-Mundhir that he was going to return to his father, so he set out to see the latter. But his father Yazdajird, because of his evil character, paid no attention to any of his children and merely took Bahram as one of his servants, so that Bahram suffered great hardship in this.\(^{227}\) At that point, an embassy came to Yazdajird under a brother of the Roman Emperor, called Thiyâdhus (Theodosius), seeking a peace agreement and a truce in fighting for the emperor and the Romans.\(^{228}\) Hence Bahram asked Thiyâdhus to speak with Yazdajird and to secure for Bahram permission to return to al-Mundhir. So he returned to the land of the Arabs, where he devoted himself to a life of ease and enjoyment.

Bahram's father Yazdajird died while Bahram was away. A group of the great men of state and nobles came together and made an agreement among themselves not to raise to the throne any of Yazdajird's offspring because of his evil conduct. They said, "Yazdajird has not left any son capable of assuming the royal power except for Bahram; but he has not yet governed any province [of the realm] by means of which his abilities may be tested and his capabilities thereby known. Nor has he had an education..."

\(^{226}\) The tale of Bahram's prowess in the chase—thus explaining his sobriquet "the Wild Ass," see n. 220 above—figures in or is echoed by various other sources. See, e.g., Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyûn al-akhbâr, I, 178; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbâr al-tiwâl, 54; Tabari-Bal'ami, trans. II, 117–18; al-Mas'ûdi, Murûj, II, 191 – § 613, referring for further details to his Akhbâr al-zamân and his Kitâb al-Awsâf (both now lost, despite the existence of apocryphal works bearing these titles, see Ahmad M. H. Shboul, Al-Mas'ûdi and His World. A Muslim Humanist and His Interest in Non-Muslims, 72–73 and nn. 126–27; EP, s.v. al-Mas'ûdi [Ch. Pellat]). Hunting scenes depicting Bahram, such as this adventure with the lion and wild ass, became favorite subjects for later Persian miniature painting. See Efr, s.v. Bahram. vi. Bahram V Gür in Persian Legend and Literature (W. L. Hanaway).

\(^{227}\) Although this piece of information would seem to be just one more item with which to blacken Yazdagird's reputation, Nöldeke, trans. 90 n. 2, thought that there might conceivably have been some bad blood between father and son, with Bahram's being sent to al-Hirah as a sort of exile. This is, however, pure conjecture.

\(^{228}\) The name of the "brother of the Roman Emperor" is in fact that of the then emperor himself, Theodosius II [r. 408–50].
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

in Persian ways, but his education has been solely in Arab ways, so that his nature is like the Arabs' nature, seeing that he has grown up among them." The view of the great men of state and the nobles agreed with that of the mass of people ('āmmah) (i.e., of the military and landed classes below the topmost ranks of society): that the royal power should be diverted from Bahram to a man from the family of Ardashir, son of Bābak (i.e., a man from a collateral line of descent from the first Sāsānid emperor) called Kīsrā, and without delay they raised this last to the royal power.229

The news of Yazdajird's death, and the leading men's raising of Kīsrā to the throne, reached Bahram at a time when he was out in the Arabian Desert. He sent for al-Mundhir and his son al-Nu'mān, plus a group of the chiefs of the Arabs, and said to them, "I feel sure that you will not deny my father's special favor (khīsīsā) which you have enjoyed, O Arabs, and the beneficence and largesse he has showered upon you, while at the same time he has been harsh and savage against the Persians." He then passed on to them the information that had reached him announcing his father's death and the Persians' appointment of a king as a result of deliberations among themselves. Al-Mundhir replied, "Don't let that make you apprehensive; I will find some stratagem for dealing with the situation." Al-Mundhir therefore fitted out a force of ten thousand cavalrymen from the Arabs and sent them, under his son's command, against Ctesiphon and Bih-Ardashir, the two royal cities.230 He further ordered him to encamp near to them and to keep sending forward reconnaissance units against them. If anyone were to make a move toward giving battle to him, he should fight him, and he should raid into the territory adjacent to

229. Before this happened, Shābūr, the eldest of Yazdājird's three sons, in fact hastened from Persian Armenia, where he had acted as king since the death of its Arsacid ruler in 414, to Ctesiphon in order to enforce his claim by seniority to the crown, but was killed at the capital by the nobles and priests, according to the Armenian writer Moses Khorenac'i. See Nöldeke, trans. 91 n. 4; Christensen, Sassanides, 274–75; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 144; EIr, s.v. Bahram V (O. Klíma).

230. Presumably from the Dawsar, the Shahbā' and other units of the Lakhmid forces. The forces sent to the Sawād and to Bih Ardashir near Ctesiphon in order to support Bahram's bid for the throne may well have been numerous, but ten thousand looks like a suspiciously round number.
the two cities, take captives, adults and children; but he forbade him to shed blood. Al-Nu‘màn advanced until he encamped near to the two cities, sent out advanced reconnaissance units toward them, and made fighting with the Persians his chief task.

Then the great men of state and the nobles at the [Persian] court dispatched Juwānī,231 the head of Yazdajird’s chancery, to al-Mundhir, and they wrote letters to the latter informing him of what al-Nu‘màn was doing. When Juwānī reached al-Mundhir and read out the letter that had been written to him, al-Mundhir said, “Go and meet King Bahram,” and he provided him with someone who would conduct him to Bahram. Juwānī went into Bahram’s presence, but the sight of Bahram’s handsomeness and splendid appearance reduced him to a state of alarm and, out of confusion, he forgot to prostrate himself before Bahram. Bahram realized at that moment that Juwānī had only omitted the prostration because he had been awe-stricken by his own outstandingly beautiful form.232 Bahram spoke to him and personally assured him of promises of favor. He sent him back to al-Mundhir, whom he told that he would give an answer to what he had written. Al-Mundhir said to Juwānī, “I have been thinking about the letter which you have brought to me. It was only King Bahram who sent al-Nu‘màn to your region, since God has given him the royal power after his father and conferred [power] on him over you.” When Juwānī heard al-Mundhir’s words, and recalled to mind Bahram’s outstandingly beautiful form, which he had seen face to face, and the awe for Bahram he had felt in his spirit, [he realized] that all those who

231. Thus in Nöldeke’s text, but interpreted by him in his trans., 92 n. 1, as Juwānūyah, with the Persian hypocoristic ending -ūyah, which the Arab philologists turned into -wayhi, and as probably being a contracted form of some compound name like Juwānmard or Juwānshir. Cf. Justi, Namenbuch, 123.

232. This is the royal xwaranah of the Avesta, MP xwarrah or farr(ah), NP farr, the divine aura of the ruler, one of the most enduring concepts in Persian national history, the “royal glory” that legitimized the authority of theocratic rulers and brought them success. See Marquart, “Beiträge zur Geschichte und Sage von Erān,” 667–69; Yarshater, “Iranian Common Beliefs and World View,” 345–46, and the references at 345 n. 2; Almut Hintze, Der Zamydd-Yašt. Edition, Übersetzung. Kommentar, 15–33, with further literature (the most up-to-date discussion of the term’s etymology and meaning, she believes that it means “Glücksglanz”).
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

had advised depriving Bahram of his royal power were revealed as persons to be discounted and rejected in argument. He said to al-Mundhir, "I am not going to take back any reply. But you yourself, if you see fit, go to the royal residence, so that the great men of state and the nobles who are there may gather round you and take counsel together about the matter. Bring forward good arguments, for they will oppose you in nothing which you advise."

Al-Mundhir then sent back Juwâni to those who had sent him in the first place. He made his preparations and went forth, just one day after Juwâni's departure, in company with Bahram and at the head of thirty thousand cavalrymen, courageous and mighty warriors, from amongst the Arabs, against the two cities of the [Persian] king. When they reached the two cities, he gave orders, and the people gathered together, with Bahram seated on a golden throne (minbar) encrusted with jewels and al-Mundhir at his right hand. The great men of state and the nobles of the Persians spoke, and in their speech set out before al-Mundhir how harsh Bahram's father had been and his evil conduct; how, through his perverted judgment, the land had been ruined; and how he had killed large numbers of people unjustly and had even slaughtered the people of his own land; and [they recounted] many other enormities. They mentioned that it was only because of these facts that they had taken counsel together and made an agreement to divert the royal power away from Yazdâjird's offspring. They asked al-Mundhir not to force them to accept anything in regard to the royal power that they would dislike. Al-Mundhir fully comprehended all that they had pointed out regarding this matter, but he said to Bahram, "It is more fitting that you, rather than me should answer the people."

Bahram replied, "I cannot deny as false, O group of spokesmen, any part of the deeds for which you have accused Yazdâjird of responsibility, because I am myself convinced of its truth. I have personally denounced him for his evil example and have avoided him, on account of his way of behavior and belief; hence I have unceasingly asked God graciously to bestow upon me the royal power so that I might put right all that he has done wrong and repair what he has split asunder.234 If I reign for just one year and have not fulfilled all the things I have enumerated to you, then I will freely and willingly renounce all claim to the throne. I call upon God, His angels, and the Chief Mōbadh to bear witness that I do this, and let the last named be the arbiter and judge between us. Moreover, despite what I have explained to you, I am ready to tell you that I am content to accept your appointing as king the person who can snatch the crown and the regalia from between two rav-ening lions with their cubs;235 let such a person be king!

---

233. Reading, with the Cairo text, muḥīrān for the Leiden text's mukhbīrān.

When the people heard these words of Bahram's and what he had, personally and from the heart, promised, they rejoiced at that, their hopes were raised, and they said among themselves, "We cannot reject Bahram's words. Seeing that, if we carry to its conclusion the decision to exclude Bahram from the throne, we will thereby be thrown into fear of bringing about our own destruction, given the large numbers of Arabs he has brought to his aid and has summoned up. We shall, on the other hand, be able to test him in regard to what he has laid before us, promises which only confidence in his own strength, bravery, and boldness would have led him to make. If he is really as he has described himself, our decision can only be to hand over the royal power to him and to show him obedience and submission. But if he perishes through weakness and impotence, we shall be guiltless of any part in his death and secure from any malevolence and trouble from him."

With this resolution, they dispersed. Bahram came back again [on the next day] after he had originally spoken to them and sat down just as he had sat down the previous day. The persons who had previously opposed him were also there. He told them: "Either you agree to what I proposed to you yesterday or else you keep silent, humbling yourselves and giving obedience." The people answered: "We ourselves have made the choice of Kusrā to direct the affairs of state, and have only experienced good actions from

234. According to Nöldeke, trans. 94 n. 2, the Sprenger manuscript elaborates on this prayer: that Bahram promises to lower the land tax, to increase the army's pay, and to give the nobles and great men still higher offices. Nöldeke thought that these express promises certainly belonged to the original source used here.

235. That is, alluding to the contest, described below, between himself and the rival contender for the throne, Khusraw.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

him. Nevertheless, we are willing that the crown and regalia should be set down, as you have suggested, before two lions and that you and KISRĀ should contend together for them; to whichever of you manages to snatch them from among the lions we will transfer the royal power."

Bahram was agreeable to what they proposed, so the Chief MōBADH, who was responsible for placing the crown on the head of every king who was invested with royal power,236 brought in the crown and regalia, and he placed them at one side. BISTĀM the ISBABADH237 brought in two fierce, hungry lions with their cubs, and stationed one of them at the side of the place where the crown and regalia had been set down and the other opposite it, and released their chains. Bahram said to KISRA, "You have first go at the crown and regalia!" KISRA responded, "It is more fitting that you should have the first attempt at getting them for yourself, because you are seeking the royal power by right of inheritance while I am an usurper in regard to it." Bahram had nothing against his words because of his confidence in his own bravery and strength. He took up a mace238 and made toward the crown and regalia. The

236. Nöldeke, trans. 96 n. 1, noted that, among the Persian Arsacids and in Armenia, it was one of the leading nobles who had the hereditary right to crown the ruler.

237. The SPĀHBED or "Army chief," Arabized as ISBABADH, whose title goes back to Achaemenid times, was the supreme military commander and war minister in the Sāsānīd empire. In the first three centuries or so of the dynasty's rule, there was a single, supreme SPĀHBED, but in the sixth century Khusrav Anūsharwān, fearing such a concentration of power in the hands of a single person, divided the office and appointed four SPĀHBEDS for each of the quarters of the realm. See Justi, Namenbuch, 306; Marquart, "Beiträge zur Geschichte und Sage von Erān," 635-39; Christensen, Sassanides, 99, 104, 130-31, 370-71, 519-21; Eilers, "Iranisches Lehrgut im arabischen Lexikon," 215; Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 198; EP, s.v. ISPABADH (C. E. Bosworth).

BISTĀM is the Arabized form of NP BISTAHM, from the unattested OP *VISTAXMA, with the parallel form GUSTĀHM, literally, "wielding far-extending power." See Justi, Namenbuch, 371-72; Eilt, s.v. BESTĀM [W. Eilers]. The SPĀHPAT named here as BISTAHM or BISTĀM is apparently the BISTĀM, "ISBABADH of the Sawād, who held the rank of HAŻĀR-RAFT" [on which latter title, see Nöldeke, trans. 76 n. 2, and Justi, op. cit., 88, 128], who, according to al-Dinawari, AL-AKBĀR AL-TIWĀL, 55, was one of the great men of state who had met together on Yazdagird's death to exclude any descendant of the deceased ruler from the succession in favor of the remote kinsman Khusrav [al-Ṭabarî, I, 858, p. 86 above, cf. also I, 993, p. 303 and n. 711 below].

238. The mace or club (Pers. gurz, here Arabized to jurz) appears in Persian lore
Chief Mōbadh said to him “What you have embarked upon puts you in mortal danger; this is all done freely and of your own accord, and none of the Persians has put the idea into your head. We are blameless before God of your [possible] self-destruction.” Bahrām replied, “[Yes], you are absolved of all responsibility and have no burden of blame regarding it.” Then he darted quickly toward the lions. When the Chief Mōbadh perceived Bahram’s vigor in confronting the lions, he cried out to him [again], saying, “Confess openly your sins and show repentance for them, then step forward, if you are completely determined on doing so.” Bahram confessed the sins he had committed239 and advanced towards the two lions. One of them sprang towards him, but when it got near, Bahram leapt with a single bound onto its back, squeezed the lion’s flanks with his thighs so firmly that he threw the lion into distress, and he set about beating its head with the mace he had brought.

At that point, the other lion hurled itself at him, but he seized it by its two ears, rubbed them violently with both his hands, and kept on dashing its head against the head of the other lion on which he was riding until he had battered out their brains; then he killed them both by raining blows on their heads with the mace he had with him. This action he did before the eyes of Kisra and all the persons assembled for the occasion.240 After that, Bahram took up for himself the crown and regalia. Kisra was the first to call out to him, saying, “May God grant you long life, Bahram, to whom all around are giving their ear and their obedience, and may He give you rule over the seven climes of the earth!”241 At that, all and epic as the weapon par excellence of heroes. Hamzah al-İsfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 49, describes Bahrām Gūr, after representations which he had seen, as seated on his throne with a mace in his hand.

239. A touch noted by Nöldeke, trans. 97 n. i, as very characteristic of the Perso-Islamic transmission of this story.

241. Here, aqlīm, sing. iqlīm, refers to the ancient Iranian idea of the seven kishwars or “regions of the earth” grouped round the central kishwar, the inhabited world, the region most favored by nature for human life and human development, the Avestan xwāniratha-, MP khwani rah; see C. Brunner, “Geographical those present cried out, saying, "We submit to King Bahrām, we humble ourselves before him and are content to have him as king," and they sent up profuse prayers for him. The great men of state, the nobles, the provincial governors and the viziers came to al-Mundhir after that day, and besought him to speak with Bahrām, asking forgiveness for their injurious conduct toward him, pardon, and overlooking of their faults. Al-Mundhir spoke to Bahrām regarding their request, and asked him to bestow now as benevolence all the personal animus he had [previously] borne against them. Bahram satisfied al-Mundhir in what he had asked, and gave them hopes of future beneficence.242

Bahrām assumed the royal power when he was twenty years old. On the very same day, he ordered his subjects to celebrate a general holiday and festivities. After that, he sat in public audience for all the people for seven days continuously, giving them promises of his benevolent rule and enjoining upon them fear of God and obedience to Him. But when he had become king, Bahram continuously devoted himself to pleasure, to the exclusion of everything else, until his subjects reproached him profusely for this conduct and the neighboring monarchs became desirous of conquering his land and seizing his kingdom.243 and Administrative Divisions: Settlements and Economy," 747. The idea later took shape that the six lands surrounding Persia were those of India, China, the Turks, the Rûm, Africa, and the Arabs; see Ep2, s.v. İklim (A. Miquel).

242. Nöledeke, trans. 98 n. 1, held that Bahrām had succeeded to power against the desires of the nobility and priesthood, and was now in a position of strength vis-à-vis those two classes. In fact, this initial lack of support from the nobility probably placed Bahrām in a somewhat weak position, and explains his cooperation with the commanding figure in the state of Mihr Narseh. The latter was known as an implacable foe of the Christians, and almost immediately on Bahrām's accession, the emperor ordered, or at least condoned, a savage persecution of the Persian Christians; several members of the Persian nobility suffered. It was reaction to the plight of refugees from the western frontier regions of Persia fleeing to Byzantine territory which led to the Perso-Byzantine war of 421–22, mentioned by al-Tabari, I, 868, p. 103, and see n. 261 below. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 109; Christensen, Sassanides, 280–81; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 148; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 940–41.

243. Other sources, such as al-Ya'qūbi, Ta'rikh, I, 184, and al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 56, describe Bahrām's excessive love of sport and diversion (lahw) and of hunting, until he was reproached for this by the great men of the kingdom, and ambitious neighboring rulers, like the king of the Turks, were emboldened to
The first ruler to set himself up as a rival to Bahram in power was Khāqān, the king of the Turks, who attacked Bahram with an army of 250,000 Turks. News of Khāqān’s approaching their land with a powerful force reached the Persians. It appeared to them a catastrophe and terrified them. A group of the Persian great men of state, known for their firm judgment and their solicitude attack Persia. Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, 49, has a story about Bahram’s passion that people should enjoy themselves and busy themselves with music making, to the extent that he sent to the king of India a request for musicians (mulḥīn). The king sent twelve thousand of these, whom Bahram spread throughout his realm; this was the origin of the Zuṭ, i.e., gypsies. Al-Masʿūdi, Mūri, II, 157–58 –§ 582, states that Bahram promoted musicians to a higher rank in society than previously.

244. The mention here of the Turks, with their grossly inflated army, is, as noted in n. 148 above, probably an anachronism, although there seem to have been Turks in the Eurasian steppelands by the fifth century, as was certainly the case in the sixth century when the first Turk empire, with its western and eastern wings, was constituted. See D. Sinor and S. G. Klyashtorny, “The Turk Empire,” 332–35; Sinor, “The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire,” 285, 287, EIP, s.v. Turks. I. History. I. The Pre-Islamic Period [L. Bazin]. The “Turks” mentioned here by al-Ṭabari were, in Bahram’s time, quite likely the Kidarites or Chionites, successors to the Kushans in Bactria, i.e., the upper Oxus lands and what is now northern Afghanistan; the Sprenger manuscript speaks of a marzbān-i Kushān who guarded the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānīd kingdom, but “the land of the Kushans” was by now a generic term for all the lands in the east. See Nöldeke, trans. 99 n. 1, 102 n. 2; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 83–84; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 142; A. D. H. Bivar, “The History of Eastern Iran,” 211–14.

The rendering in Arabic, Khāqān, of the Turkish ruler’s title corresponds to the oldest attestation of the title in Turkish, the Qaghan of the Tonyuquq inscription in Mongolia [ca. 720], and in the Orkhon inscriptions it has the meaning of “an independent ruler over a people or tribe,” hence not only applicable to the Qaghan of the two empires of the Eastern and Western Turks but also, e.g., to the Chinese emperor, referred to as Tabghach Qaghan in both the Tonyuquq and the Kūl Tīgin inscriptions. In Byzantine Greek sources of this time it appears as Chagano [Gy. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica. II. Sprachreste der Türkvolker in den byzantinischen Quellen, 332–34]. The title is undoubtedly an ancient one, clearly recognizable as a royal title of such Inner Asian peoples as the Juan-juan and the Tu-yūhu [ca. A.D. 400] but possibly recognisable from Chinese transcriptions as a title of the much earlier Hsiuŋ-nu, according to E. G., Pulleyblank, “The Consonantal System of Old Chinese. Part II,” 260–62, and Doerfer, confirming the earlier opinion of Marquart, Eränsahr, 54. Its etymology must accordingly be lost in the obscurity surrounding these Inner Asian peoples known to us only as names from the Chinese sources. See the discussions in C. E. Bosworth and Sir Gerard Clauson, "Al-Xwarazmi on the Peoples of Central Asia," 9; G. Doerfer, Türkische und mongolische Elemente im Neupersischen. Türkische Elemente, II, 141–79 no. 1160; Clauson, An Etymological Dictionary of Pre-Thirteenth-Century Turkish, 611.
for the masses of the people, went into Bahram's presence and told him, "O king, there has suddenly come upon you the calamitous appearance of the enemy, and this should be enough to rouse you from the pleasure and merry-making in which you are sunk. So get ready to tackle it, lest we become afflicted by something which will entail revilement and shame for you." Bahram merely replied, "God, our Lord, is powerful, and we are under His protection," and he only increased in his exclusive pursuit of pleasure and merry-making. But then he fitted out an expedition and proceeded to Azerbaijan, in order to worship at the fire temple there, then to Armenia to seek game for hunting in its thickets and to enjoy himself on the way. He was accompanied by a group of seven of the great men of state and the nobles plus three hundred mighty and courageous men from his personal guard. He left one of his brothers, called Narsi, to act as his governor over the kingdom.

When the people heard about Bahram's expedition and his appointment of his brother as his deputy to govern the kingdom, they felt sure that this was an act of flight from his enemy and an act of abandonment of his kingdom. They took counsel together and resolved to send an embassy to Khaghan and to undertake that they would pay him tribute, out of fear that he would invade their land and would annihilate their own troops unless they showed themselves submissive to him by handing the money over. Khaghan heard about what the Persians had agreed upon, that they would submit and show themselves submissive to him, so he gave a guarantee of security for their land and ordered his army to hold back. Bahram, however, had sent forward a spy to bring back to him information about Khaghan; the spy now returned and told him about Khaghan's doings and intentions. So Bahram marched against him with the force accompanying him and fell on him by

245. This is the ancient, celebrated fire temple of Adur-Gushnaspat at Shiz, by or near Ganzak or Ganjak, the Greek Ganzaka, to the southeast of Lake Urmia (to be distinguished from the Ganjah in Arran, in Transcaucasia), in more recent times known as Takht-i Sulayman. In the next century after this, Khusraw Anusharwan transferred the fire to a site in the mountains of southern Azerbaijan less open to Byzantine attack. See on its location, V. Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 97-103; also Noldeke, trans. 100 n. 1; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 113-18, 128-31; EP, s.v. Shiz (J. Ruska and C. E. Bosworth).
night, killing Khāqān with his own hand and spreading slaughter among Khāqān’s troops. Those who escaped being killed were put to flight and showed their backs. They left behind their encampment, their wives and children and their baggage. Bahram exerted himself assiduously in hunting them down, killing them, gathering up the plunder he had seized from them and enslaving their women and children, and returned with his own army intact.246

Bahram had seized Khāqān’s crown and diadem and had conquered his country in the land of the Turks. He appointed a Warden of the Marches [Marzbān]247 over these conquered territories, providing him with a silver throne. A group of people from the regions bordering on the land of the Turks that he had conquered came to Bahram, submissive and offering him obedience, and they asked him to demarcate for them the boundary between his and their territories, which they would not then cross. So he duly delimited the frontier for them, and ordered the construction of a tall and slender tower (manārah); this is the tower which Fayruz, son of Yazdajird [II] [later] gave orders for its [re]building, and it was erected in a forward position on [the frontier of] the land of the Turks. Bahram also sent one of his military commanders to Transoxania in the land of the Turks and instructed him to fight the people there. So he made war on them and wrought great slaughter among them, until they promised submission to Bahram and the payment of tribute.

Bahram now went back to Azerbaijan and then to his residence

246. Al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 56–57, gives details of Bahram’s itinerary as he marched to engage the “Turkish” army through Tabaristān and the Caspian coastlands to Gurgān, then across northern Khurāsān via Nasā to Marw. The battle then took place at Kushmayan, a village in the Marw oasis [see on this village, Le Strange, Lands, 400; Ḥudūd al-‘ālam, trans. 105]. As Nöldeke commented, trans. 101 n. 2, there seems no reason to doubt the authenticity of this location for the battle, and Marquart equated this more or less exactly with the site of the battle between Wishtasp and the Chionites in the Ayādgār ʾI Zarērān “Memorial of Zarēr,” see his Erānšahr, 51–52.

247. Marzbān “protector of the frontier,” Arabized as marz(u)bān, is used in Sāsānīd administrative and military terminology from the fourth century onward for the military governor of such frontier provinces as Upper Mesopotamia [the commander here being based on Nisibin], Bēth Aramāyē, and, as here, Khurāsān. See Nöldeke, trans. 102 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 197–98; Eilers, “Iranisches Lehngut im arabischen Lexikon,” 219; EP, s.v. Marzpān [J. H. Kramers-M. J. Morony].
in the Sawād [of Iraq]. He ordered that the rubies and other jewels in Khāqān's diadem should be hung up in the fire temple of Azerbaijan, and then he set off and came to the city of Ctesiphon. He took up his quarters in the administrative headquarters (dār al-mamlakah) there. He sent letters to his troops and provincial governors announcing how he had killed Khāqān and what he and the Persian army had accomplished. Then he appointed his brother Narsī governor of Khurāsān, instructed him to make his way thither and to establish his residence at Balkh, and ordered for him whatever he required.

Toward the end of his life, Bahram went to Māh for hunting there. One day he rode out to the chase, fastened tenaciously onto a wild ass and pursued it closely. But he fell into a pit and sank into the mud at the bottom. When his mother heard of that accident, she hurried along to that pit, taking with her a large sum of money. She remained near the pit, and ordered that the money should be paid out to whoever might rescue Bahram from the hole. They excavated a vast amount of earth and mud from the pit, until they had made a number of large mounds from this; but they were never able to find Bahram's corpse.

248. Balkh lay in the heart of Bactria, the early Islamic Ṭukhāristān, and must at this time have been in the hands of a power like the Kushans or their epigoni; subsequently, it was a principal residence of the king of the northern Hephthalites. It is highly unlikely that any Sāsānīd control could have been exerted at this time as far east as Balkh; Marw was probably the northeasternmost bastion of Persian power. See Nöldeke, trans. 103 n. 1.

249. The OP Māda-, i.e., Media or northwestern Persia, a name that survived into Islamic times as Māh, included in the toponyms Māh al- Báorah = Nīḩāwand, and Māh al- Kūfah = Dinawar. See Le Strange, Lands, 190 and n. 2; ElP, s.v. Māh al- Báorah (M. J. Morony).

250. This story of Bahram's end also appears, very cursorily in al- Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184, and al- Mas'ūdi, Murūj, II, 190 = § 612, but in detail in al- Dinawari, al- Akhbār al- tiwāl, 58, who says that the story of Bahram's death was still current in the area of Dāy- mari, the place where the king was swallowed up (this lay near Hamadhān and was later famous as the site of a battle in 584/1188 when the last Seljuq sultan of the East, Țoghrīl III, defeated the 'Abbāsid caliph al- Nāṣir's forces; see Schwarz, Iran, 553). This whole region of Māh or Media was a favorite one of Bahram's, and he is said to have had a splendid palace at Mādharūstān near Ḥulwān and a fortress near Hamadhān (Le Strange, Lands, 193, 195). Nöldeke, trans. 103 n. 3, thought that this tale of the manner of Bahram's death originated in an attempt to provide an alternative explanation to his by-name Gūr/jūr in the sense of "wild ass," i.e., one from gōr in the sense of "pit, grave."
It is mentioned that, when Bahram returned to his realm from his expedition against the Turks, he addressed the people of his kingdom for several days continuously, urging them in his speech to maintain their obedience and informing them that his intention was to render circumstances easy for them and to bring them a good way of life; but if they should stray from the straight way of righteousness, they would suffer treatment from him more severe than what they had experienced under his father. The latter had begun his reign over them with lenience and equity; but then they, or at least some of them, had rejected that policy and not shown themselves submissive, as servants and slaves should in fact show themselves toward kings. This had impelled him into harsh policies: he had beaten people and had shed blood.

Bahram’s return journey from that expedition [against the Turks] was via the road to Azerbaijan; he presented to the fire temple at al-Shiz the rubies and jewels that were in Khaghan’s diadem, a sword belonging to Khaghan encrusted with pearls and jewels, and many other precious adornments. He gave Khätün, Khaghan’s wife, to the temple as a servant there. He remitted to the people three years’ land tax as a thank offering for the victory he had achieved in his expedition, and he divided up among the poor and destitute a great sum of money, and among the nobles and persons of meritorious behavior twenty million dirhams. He sent letters to the distant lands with news about his

251. In Orkhon Turkish, qatun/khatun denoted the wife of the Qaghan, borrowed into Mongolian as qadun, but later it tended to mean “noble woman” and, eventually, by Ottoman times, little more than “married lady, woman” in the form kadin [a relationship noted by Nöldeke, trans. 104 n. 2]. It has traditionally been considered as a loan word from Sogdian xwt’yn, “wife of the lord or ruler,” but from Paul Pelliot onward, doubts have been raised over this. Pulleyblank, “The Consonantal System of Old Chinese. Part II,” 262–64, states that related forms are to be found among the Inner Asian Altaic people of the T’o-pa, successors of the Hsiung-nu in the early centuries A.D. G. Doerfer has pointed out the phonological difficulties in the transition Sogdian khwätên > Old Turkish *khaghatun/ qaghatun. Instead, he posits an ultimate origin in the Inner Asian peoples of Turco-Mongolian stock known to us from Chinese sources, perhaps from as far back as the eastern Hsiung-nu. See Türkische und mongolische Elemente im Neupersischen. Türkische Elemente, II, 132–41 no. 1149; Clauson, Etymological Dictionary, 602–63.

252. That is, as a manifestation of contempt for the paganism of the captured queen; cf. Nöldeke, trans. 104 n. 3.
dealing with Khāqān, in which he mentioned how reports had reached him that Khāqān had invaded his lands, and how he had extolled and magnified God and had depended completely on Him, how he had marched against Khāqān with a guard of [only] seven men from the nobility and three hundred cavalrymen from the choicest warriors of his personal guard, via the Azerbaijan and Caucasus Mountains road until he had reached the deserts and wastes of Khwārazm, and how God had then tested him [in battle] with a most successful outcome. He further mentioned to them how much land tax he had remitted to them. His letter containing this information was an eloquent and penetrating one.

When Bahram had first achieved the royal power, he had given orders that the arrears of the land tax from previous years (al-baqāyā) and for which the taxpayers were still liable, should be cancelled. He had been informed that these arrears amounted to seventy million dirhams, but had nevertheless given orders that they were to be remitted. He also remitted one-third of the land tax for the year in which he had ascended to power.

It is said that, when Bahram Jūr returned to Ctesiphon from his expedition against Khāqān the Turk, he appointed his brother Narsī as governor of Khurasan and assigned him Balkh as his capital [there]. He appointed as his vizier Mihr Narsi, son of Burāzāh, made him one of his intimates and nominated him as Buzurjfarmadhar. He then announced to him that he was going

253. In Arabic administrative literature of the fourth/tenth century, al-baqāyā “arrears of taxation from previous years” seems to be distinguished from al-bāqī “taxation of the current year still uncollected.” See Bosworth, “Abū ‘Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary’s Art,” 135.

254. If the report is authentic, this concession was presumably possible because of the great amount of plunder taken from the Turks; cf. Nöldeke, trans., 105 n. 5.

255. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 865, p. 97 and n. 4 above.

256. This paternal name is somewhat problematical. Nöldeke, trans. 106 n. 2, unconvincingly connected it with place names in Fārs. Justi, Namensbuch, 70, noted the Greek form Bōrazē for Hebrew Bigtā, the name of one of the seven eunuchs who served King Ahasuerus as chamberlains in Esther, i.10.

257. The framadar was originally, it appears, the steward of the royal household and then administrator of the royal estates, and finally, by Sāsānid times, the first civilian minister in the state. The extended title of wuzurg “great” framadar is characteristic of the later Sāsānid period, and this Mihr Narsēh [whose genealogy al-Ṭabarī subsequently traces back to pre-Sāsānid times (see I, 868–69, p. 104 below) appears as one of the first persons mentioned as holding the office. See to the land of India in order to get information about conditions there and to find out by subtle means whether he could add part of the Indian lands to his own territory, in order that he might thereby lighten some of the tax burden on his own subjects. He gave him (sc., Mihr Narsi) the necessary orders concerning all the matters relative to his appointment as regent up to the time of his own return, and set off on the journey from his kingdom until he reached Indian territory, traveling in disguise. He remained there a considerable time, without any of the local people asking at all about him and his situation, except that they were favorably impressed by what they saw regarding him: his equestrian skill, his killing of wild beasts, his handsomeness, and the perfection of his form.

He continued thus until he heard that there was in one region of their land an elephant, which had made the roads unsafe for travelers and had killed a great number of people. He accordingly asked one of the local people to direct him toward the beast so that he might kill it. This intention came to the ears of the king; he summoned Bahram and sent an envoy to accompany him, who was to go back to him with an account of Bahram’s actions. When Bahram and the envoy came to the patch of dense jungle where the elephant was, the accompanying envoy shinned up a tree in order to see what Bahram would do. Bahram went forward to try and lure out the elephant, and shouted to it. The elephant came forth toward him, foaming with rage, trumpeting loudly and with a fearsome appearance. When it got near, Bahram shot an arrow at it right between the eyes, in such a way that the arrow almost disappeared in the beast’s head, and he showered arrows on it until he

The wuzzur framadar has been seen by some scholars as a forerunner of the early Islamic vizier, the chief minister of the caliphs from ‘Abbāsid times onward [for whose name, wazir, some have sought a Persian etymology, see below, although more recent opinion favors an indigenous Arabic one—not that this philological question is particularly relevant anyway to the question of continuity in function and practice]. See the discussion in D. Sourdel, Le vizirat ‘abbāside de 749 à 936 (132 à 324 de l’Hégire), I, 41–61; and for a reassertion of a Persian origin for the word, in MP wizar [apparently attested, however, in the opinion of Mr F. C. de Blois, only as an abstract noun “decision, judgment”), see Eilers, “Iranisches Lehngut im arabischen Lexikon,” 207.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

reduced it to a sorry state. He then leaped upon it, seized it by the trunk and dragged it downward, which made the elephant sink down on its knees. He kept on stabbing it until he got the upper hand over it and was then able to cut off its head. He rolled it over on to its back and brought it forth to the roadside. The king’s envoy was meanwhile watching all this.

When the envoy returned, he related the whole story of Bahrām’s doings to the king. The king was full of wonder at Bahrām’s strength and boldness, gave him rich presents and questioned him about himself and his background. Bahrām told him that he was one of the great men of the Persians, but had incurred the wrath of the king of Persia for a certain reason, hence had fled from him to the king of India’s protection. Now that latter monarch had an enemy who had tried to deprive him of his kingdom and had marched against him with a large army. The king, Bahrām’s patron, had become fearful of the enemy because of what he knew of this enemy’s might and the fact that the latter demanded of him submission and payment of tribute. Bahrām’s patron was on the point of acceding to the enemy’s demands, but Bahrām dissuaded him from that, and guaranteed to him that the affair would be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The king’s mind became tranquil and confident in Bahram’s words, and Bahrām set out, prepared for war.

When the two armies encountered each other, Bahrām said to the Indian cavalrmen (asāwirah),258 “Protect my rear,” and then

258. This is the Arabic broken pl. formed from the sing. aswār/ uswār, from MP aswār, “cavalryman,” used specifically in Sāsānid times for the heavy, mailed cavalrmen who formed the backbone of the army. It seems originally to have denoted a high military rank, the chief of a military unit, but in Sāsānid times came to be applied to the cavalrmen in general. These aswārān were certainly ranked among what might be called the aristocracy and landed gentry of Persia, and in the fiscal reforms of Khosraw Anūshārān they were one of the classes exempted from paying the poll tax on account of their great services to the state (thus enumerated by al-Ṭabari, I, 962, p. 259 below, where al-muqātīlah = aswārān; in his equivalent passage, al-Dinawari specifically has asāwirah, see n. 625 below). In the accounts of the battles of the Muslim Arabs with the armies of the last Sāsānids, e.g., in al-Baladhuri’s Futūh al-buldān, the asāwirah emerge as an élite of mounted archers. See Lekkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 171, and the detailed discussion in Widengren, “Recherches sur le feodalisme iranien,” 170–76; and for later usage of the term aswār, extending up to Mughal and British Indian times as suwār, Anglicised as sowar, see EIr, s.v. Asāwera (C. E. Bosworth).
he led an assault on the enemy. He began to strike their heads with blows that split the head down to the mouth; to strike another in midbody so that he cut him in half; to go up to an elephant and sever its trunk with his sword; and to sweep a rider off his saddle. The Indians are a people who are not very skillful in archery, and most of them fought on foot, not having horses; when, on the other hand, Bahram shot an arrow at one of the enemy, the shaft penetrated right through him. When the enemy saw what was happening, they wheeled round and fled, without turning aside to do anything. Bahram’s patron seized as plunder everything in the enemy’s camp, and returned home rejoicing and glad, in company with Bahram. As a reward for Bahram’s efforts, the king bestowed on him his daughter in marriage and granted to him al-Daybul, Makran, and the adjacent parts of Sind.259 He wrote out for him an investiture patent for all this, had the grant to him confirmed before witnesses, and gave orders for those territories to

259. Daybul, the Arabized form of a possible original something like Dēwal, was the great port of Sind in pre-Islamic and early Islamic times, and the first city of the province to be captured by the Arab commander Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim al-Thaqafi in 92/711–12. Moses Khorenac’i [later sixth century to early eighth century?] mentions the district of “Dēpūhl, linking it, as here, with Makrān and Sind in general [see Marquart, Éranšahr, 45]. It lay in the Indus delta region to the west of the river’s then main channel, but its location is still a matter for conjecture since an identification with the archaeological site Bhanbore is by no means certain. See S. Qudratullah Fatimi, “The Twin Ports of Daybul. A Study in the Early Maritime History of Sind,” 97–105; EP, s.v. Daybul [A. S. Bazmee Ansari].

Makrān is the coastal region of what is now Pakistani and Persian Baluchistan. Whether it embraced the region known from Sumerian and old Akkadian texts as Magan, in the OP inscriptions Maka [where it is described as a satrapy of Darius the Great], and also from Akkadian texts as Melukkhha, has called forth varying opinions. Recently, de Blois, on the evidence of the texts of two Elamite tablets from the so-called Persepolis fortification tablets, has argued that Maka denotes the region called in Middle Iranian, Syriac, Armenian, and Arabic sources, from the third century A.D. onward, Mazūn = ’Umān; see his “Maka and Mazūn.” 160–67. Whatever the truth, Greek historians of the time of Alexander call Makrān Gedrosia; and the region appears in the Naqsh-i Rustam inscription of Kerdēr as Mkwl’ūn. Despite the reported pretensions of early Persian monarchs to control it, as here with Bahram Gūr, Makrān probably remained always within the Indian rather than the Persian political and cultural sphere, in Bahram’s time under the influence of the Brahman kings of Sind. See Ḥudūd al-‘alam, trans. 123, comm. 373; Marquart, op. cit., 33–34; Le Strange, Lands, 329–30; EP, s.v. Makrān [C. E. Bosworth].
be added to the Persian lands, with their land tax to be paid to Bahram. Bahram then returned [to his homeland] rejoicing.\textsuperscript{260}

After this, Bahram sent Mihr Narsi, son of Burazah, on an expedition against the Roman lands, at the head of a force of forty thousand warriors. He ordered him to make for their supreme ruler ('azīm) and discuss with him the question of the tribute and other things, tasks that only a man of Mihr Narsi's caliber could undertake. Mihr Narsi then marched off with this army and matériel, and entered Constantinople. He played a notable role there, and the supreme ruler of the Romans made a truce with him. He returned homeward having achieved all that Bahram had desired, and the latter heaped honors unceasingly on Mihr Narsi.\textsuperscript{261}

His name was sometimes rendered in a "lightened" (mukhaffaf) form as just Narsi, and sometimes people would say Mihr Narsih.

\textsuperscript{260.} Naturally, there is no question of the historicity of these fabulous Indian adventures of Bahram, which appear, however, in other Arabic sources such as Ibn Qutaybah, \textit{Ma'ārif}, 660–61 (detailed account, clearly based on the same source as al-Ṭabarī), al-Mas'ūdī, \textit{Murūj}, II, 191 = § 612 (describes Bahram's secret mission to the court of King Shubrumah, probably to be identified with the Gupta monarch Chandragupta II, r. 376–415); Hamzah al-Iṣfahānī, \textit{Tā'rikh}, 49 (very brief mention); and Ṭabari-Bal'amī, trans. Šīhī, II, 122–25.

\textsuperscript{261.} This is a cursory mention of the war with Byzantium that broke out in 421 shortly after Bahram's accession. It ran counter to the general trend in Byzantine-Persian relations of the period, which had been one of peace since the treaty of 384 between Theodosius II and Shābūr III. It seems to have been provoked, on the one hand, by the violent persecution of Christians within the Persian lands that broke out at the beginning of the new reign (see n. 242 above), and, on the other hand, by Byzantine attempts to use Christian missionary activities in order to secure the allegiance of Arab tribes of the Syrian Desert fringes and by the Byzantines' sheltering of Christian converts from those fringes under Persian control.

The war was ended by a peace treaty in the following year. It promised religious freedom for Christians of Persia and for Zoroastrians in the Byzantine lands; each side was prohibited from accepting and sheltering Arab allies of the other side if these Arabs should rebel, and the Greeks were to pay an annual tribute, ostensibly for the defense of the pass at Darband against the barbarians beyond the Caucasus, but which contained no territorial changes to the boundary between the two powers. See J. B. Bury, \textit{A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene} (395 A.D. to 800 A.D.), I, 304–305; idem, \textit{History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius to the Death of Justinian} (A.D. 395 to A.D. 565), I, 4–5; Labourt, \textit{Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse}, 118; Christensen, \textit{Sassanides}, 281; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 145; Z. Rubin, "Diplomacy and War in the Relations between Byzantium and the Sassanids in the Fifth Century A.D.," 679–81; G. Greatrex, "The Two Fifth-Century Wars between Rome and Persia," 1–14.
He was Mihr Narsī, son of Burāzah, son of Farrukhzād, son of Khūrahbād, son of Sīfsādh, son of Sisanābrūh, son of Kay Ashak, son of Dāra, son of Dāra, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb. Mihr Narsī was held in high honor by all the kings of Persia because of his fine education and manners, the excellence of his judgment, and the contentedness and tractability of the masses of the people with him. He had, moreover, several sons, who approached him in worth and who fulfilled various offices for the monarchs that almost reached his own office [in rank and importance]. There were three of them who had reached an outstanding position. One was Zurwândādāh, whom Mihr Narsī had intended for religion and the religious law. In this sphere he attained such a leading position that Bahram Jūr appointed him Chief Hērbād (Hirbadhān Hirbadh), a rank near to that of Chief Möbadh. The second was called Mājusnas, who remained in charge of the department of the land tax all through the reign of Bahram Jūr, the name of his rank in Persian being Wastra’ī’ushān Sālār. The third was called Kārd[ar], supreme commander of the army, the name of his rank in Persian being Rathashtaran Sālār, this is a rank higher than that of al-Iṣbahbād and is near to that of al-Arjabādāh.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Mihr Narsi’s own title of rank was in Persian Buzurjfarmadhār, which means in Arabic “supreme vizier” (wazīr al-wuzarā‘) or “supreme executive” (ta‘īṣ al-ru‘asā‘). He is said to have come from a town (qaryah) called Abruwān in the rural district of Dasht-i Bārīn in the province of Ardashīr Khurrah. He had lofty buildings erected there and at Jirih, in the province of Sābūr, because of the contiguity of that and Dasht-i Bārīn, and he constructed there for himself a fire temple, which is said to be still in existence today, with its fire still burning to this present moment. It is called Mihr Narsiyan. In the vicinity of Abruwān he founded four villages, with a fire temple in each one. He set up one of these for himself and called it Farāz-marā-āwar-khudāyā, meaning [in Arabic] “come to me, O my lord,” with the aim of showing great veneration for the fire. The second one was meant for Zarāwandādāh, and he called it Zarāwandādhān. The third was for Kārdār, and he called it Kārdādhān; and the last was for Mājushnas, and he called it Mājushnasfān. He also laid out three gardens in this region: in one of them he planted twelve thousand date palms; in another, twelve thousand olive trees; and in [the third] garden, twelve thousand cypress trees. These villages, with the gardens and the fire temples, have remained continuously in the hands of his descendants, who are well known till today, and it has been mentioned that all these remain in the best possible condition at the present time.

It has been mentioned that, after he had finished with Khāqān and the King of the Romans, Bahram proceeded to the land of the

---

267. The text has ‘b.r.wān, but the form of this name is uncertain. It may possibly be the Artuwān of al-Maqdisi, Aḥsan al-taqāsim, 258, in the list of the towns and districts of Sāsānid Persia attributed to Qubādh [I], son of Fayruz, or the Arduwāl/Arduwān of Yaqūt, Buldān, 1, 149, as a small town of southwestern Persia.

268. The “plain of Bārīn” was a district of southwestern Fārs whose urban center was in Islamic times Ghundijān. See Nöldeke, trans. III n. 4; Le Strange, Lands, 260, 268, 394; Schwarz, Iran, 68–70.

269. When “today” and “at the present time” were, is unfortunately not known.

271. These names of estates or places in -ān demonstrate connections with their founders or developers (the -ān being originally a genitive pl. ending) and were especially notable in Iraq during early Islamic times for the names of estates, canals, etc., e.g., Go Maṣrūqān, Not Artashīrakān, Nahr Sūrān.
blacks, in the region of Yemen, and fell upon them, wreaking great slaughter among them and taking large numbers of captives before returning to his kingdom. Then followed his death in the manner we have described. There are differing views on the length of his reign. Some say that it was eighteen years, ten months, and twenty days, others that it was twenty-three years, ten months, and twenty days.

[Yazdajird II]

Then there succeeded to the royal power after him Yazdajird, son of Bahram Jür. When the crown had been placed on his head, the great men of state and the nobles (ashrāf) came into his presence, invoked blessings on his head, and congratulated him on his accession to the royal power. He replied to them in pleasant terms and mentioned his father, his virtues, how he had behaved toward the subjects, and how lengthy his sessions for them (sc., for hearing complaints and receiving petitions) had been. He told them that if they did not experience from him just what they had been used to experience from his father, they should not condemn him, for his periods of withdrawal from public gaze at court were only for some aspect of public good for the kingdom and to trick enemies. [He went on to say] that he had appointed Mihr Narsi, the son of Burāzah, his father's aide, as his vizier, that he would

272. The bilād al-sūdān would be the regions of the Horn of Africa and East Africa adjacent to South Arabia, but the story that Bahram penetrated to there is quite legendary, and may have been influenced by the Persian expeditions to Yemen in the later sixth century, see al-Tabari, I, 948ff., pp. 239ff. below.

273. Bahram V Gür's reign was 420–38. His name appears on his coins as [R'MŠ-TRY] WRHR'N, i.e., (Rāmshahr) Bahram See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 62, 363-66, 447-48, Plates XIV–XV, Table XII, Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 49, Table IX, Plate 9; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 116–18; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 235.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661; al-Ya'qūbi, Ta'rikh, I, 183–84; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 56–58; al-Mas'ūdi, Murūj, II, 190–93 = §§ 612–14; idem, Tanbih, 101, trans. 144, Ḥamzah al-Īṣfahānī, Ta'rikh, 49; ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 401–406. Of Persian sources, see Šabari-Bal'ami, trans. II, 118–36. Of modern studies of his reign in general, see Christensen, Sasanides, 274–82; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 144–46, 178; EIR, s.vv. Bahram (Huart-H. Massé) and Sāsānids [M. J. Morony]; EIR, s.vv. Bahram V Gür (O. Klima), Bahram V Gür in Persian Legend and Literature [W. L. Hanaway].
behave with them in the best possible manner and would lay down for them the best of ways of conduct, and that he would unceasingly humble his enemies but continuously behave with mildness and benevolence to his subjects and his troops.274

Yazdajird had two sons, one called Hurmuz, who was ruler over Sijistān, and the other called Fayrūz. It was Hurmuz (II) who seized the royal power after his father Yazdajird's death. Fayrūz fled from him and reached the land of the Hephthalites (al-Hayāṭilah).275 He told their king the story of what had happened between him and his brother and that he had a better right to the throne than Hurmuz. He asked the king to provide him with an army with which he could combat Hurmuz and gain control of his father's kingdom, but the king of the Hephthalites refused to respond to his request until he received information that Hurmuz really was a tyrannical and unjust king. He said, "God is not pleased with injustice, and He does not let the works of those

274. Christian sources nevertheless describe Yazdagird II as a savage persecutor of the Christians, both within his kingdom proper (with records of many martyrs in Mesopotamia) and also in Armenia, where his edict of 449 imposing Zoroastrianism on Armenia and Georgia provoking the revolt there, mentioned in n. 277 below. Jews also suffered when in 454–55 Yazdagird forbade the observance of their Sabbath, and later the Persian authorities are said to have closed all Jewish schools. See Nöldeke, trans. 114 n. 1; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 126–30; Christensen, Sassanides, 283–89; Lang, "Iran, Armenia and Georgia," 520–21; Neusner, "Jews in Iran," 915–16; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 942.

275. Hayāṭilah is the Arabic broken plural of Hayṭal, correctly *Ḥabṭal. This last seems originally to have been a dynastic name, with forms of it appearing in, e.g., Byzantine sources (Hephthalitai) and Chinese ones (Ye-tai-li-li-to), the Greek form corresponding to the Sogdian nominative pl. *He밥alit; see W. B. Henning, "Neue Materialien zur Geschichte des Manichäismus," 17 n. 2. At the time of Fayrūz/Firūz's flight to the land beyond the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānid realm [i.e., in 457], the Kidarites were still ruling in Bactria and Gandhara, but were about to be replaced there, in the second half of the fifth century, by the Hephthalites (J.
Harmatta places the Hephthalite attack on the Kidarite territories in Transoxania in 466). The Hephthalites did not apparently arrive in a sudden wave from the Inner Asian steppes, but had doubtless been infiltrating into Transoxania, Bactria, and the northern fringes of Khurāsān for some time. It was to these that the fugitive Firūz was able to appeal for the help that enabled him to gain his father's old throne. See Nöldeke, trans. 115 n. 2; Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica. I. Die byzantinischen Quellen der Geschichte der Türkvölker, 69–70; Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire," 298–99; E. V. Zeimal, "The Kidarite Kingdom in Central Asia," 124–26; B. A. Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite committing it prosper, under the rule of an unjust king, a man cannot succeed properly in any enterprise or practice any trade successfully except by injustice and tyranny likewise." Then, after Fayruz had made over al-Ṭālaqān to him, he provided Fayruz with an army. Fayruz advanced with it and gave battle to his brother Hurmuz, killing him, scattering his forces, and seizing control of his kingdom.

The Romans had been dilatory in forwarding to Yazdajird, the son of Bahram, the tribute they used to pay to his father. Hence Fayruz sent against them Mihr Narsī, the son of Burāzah, with an army and matériel such as Bahram had originally sent against them for that purpose (sc., of exacting tribute), and Mihr Narsī secured the imposition of his master’s will for him.277

276. There was more than one Ṭālaqān in the eastern Persian lands and their fringes. See Nöldeke, trans. 116 n. 1; EP2, s.v. Ṭālaqān (C. E. Bosworth and J. R. Lee). The Ṭālaqān intended here is most likely the one in what was the later mediaeval Islamic province of Gūzgān, at a site now unknown but somewhere in the vicinity of modern Maymanah in northwestern Afghanistan. At the time of the Arab invasions of Bactria/Ṭūkhrāstān, it had a local (Iranian?) ruler of its own. Less likely to be the Ṭālaqān mentioned here is the one beyond Balkh and toward Badakhshān. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 6–8; Le Strange, Lands, 423; EP2, art. cit., sections 1 and 3. The mention here of the cession of Ṭālaqān to the Hephthalites implies that the Sāsānid territories never extended as far as the Oxus.

277. This was the war launched by Yazdagird II in 439 soon after he had achieved the throne. It caught the Roman empire at a critical moment when its North African provinces had just been invaded by the Germanic Vandals and when the Huns from Inner Asia were pressing on the Balkans and eastern parts of the empire. As al-Ṭabārī implies in his mention of the arrears of tribute, there were financial reasons behind the outbreak of war, the Byzantines’ refusal to contribute to the cost of defenses in the Caucasus to keep out barbarians pressing down from the north, as well as continuing disputes over the allegiance of Arab tribes in the Mesopotamian frontier region, which had caused the war with Yazdagird I twenty years previously (see n. 261 above). The war was terminated by the commander of Theodosius II’s eastern army, the Strategus Anatolicus, coming to an agreement with Yazdagird, essentially on a basis of retaining the status quo, and with the additional proviso that neither side should erect new fortresses in the frontier zone between the two empires. See Nöldeke, trans. 116 n. 2; Stein, Histoire du Bas Empire, I, 291; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 146; Rubin, “Diplomacy and War in the Relations between Byzantium and the Sassanids in the Fifth Century AD,” 68ff.; Greatrex, “The Two Fifth-Century Wars between Rome and Persia,” 2–14.

In addition to this war against the Byzantines, Nöldeke notes, trans. 113 n. 4, that Yazdagird II was involved in several other wars during his reign, unmentioned by the Arabic sources but known from Greek, Armenian, and Syriac authors. The emperor suppressed with difficulty a revolt of the Christian princes of Armenia.
According to some authorities, Yazdajird's period of royal power was eighteen years and four months, but according to others, seventeen years.278

[Fayruz I]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Fayruz,279 son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahram Jür, after he had killed his brother and three [other] members of his family. There was related to me a report going back to Hishâm b. Muḥammad [in which] he said: Fayruz prepared for war with the resources of Khurasan and called upon the men of Ṭūkhārīstān and regions neighboring on it for support,280 and marched against his brother Hurmuz, son of Yazdajird (II), who was at al-Rayy. Both Fayruz and Hurmuz had a common mother, called Dīnak, who was at al-Madā'in governing that part of the kingdom adjacent to it. Fayruz captured and im-

[see n. 274 above], the battle of 451 between the Persians and Armenians leaving behind the memory of a host of slain Armenian martyrs whose deaths are commemorated by the Armenian Church to this day. Yazdagird also repelled an invasion of the Huns through the Caucasus that had penetrated to Darband and Shirwān, and, most importantly, he engaged in strife with the Kiderites or their supplanters, defeating their king in a battle near Marw al-Rūhī. It was probably in the course of this last campaign on his eastern frontiers that Yazdagird subdued the local ruler of Şūl or Chōl in the vicinity of Gurgān (see on Şūl, al-Ṭabarī, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 below) and founded there a town, Shahrīstān-i Yazdagird, whose exact location is unknown.

278. Yazdagird II's reign was 438–57. His name appears on his coins as [KDY] YZDKRTY, i.e., [Ray] Yazdagird. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 63, 366–67, 450–52, Plate XV, Table XIII: Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 49, Table IX, Plate 10; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 119–21; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

279. In Pahlavi, Pērōz, NP Pērōz/Fīrōz, literally, "successful, victorious." See Nöldeke, trans. 117 n. 3; Justi, Namenbuch, 247–51; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 759.

280. That is, the Kiderites or Hephthalites of Bactria.
prisoned his brother. He displayed just rule and praiseworthy conduct, and showed piety. During his time, there was a seven-year-long famine, but he arranged things very competently: he divided out the monies in the public treasury, refrained from levying taxation, and governed his people to such good effect that only one person died through want in all those years.

He then marched against a people called the Hephthalites, who had taken over Tukharistan. At the outset of his reign, he had strengthened their power, because they had helped him against his brother (sc., Hurmuz). They allegedly practiced sodomy, hence Fayruz did not deem it permissible (or: it was not deemed permissible) to leave the land in their hands. He attacked the Hephthalites, but they killed him in battle, together with four of his sons and four of his brothers, all of whom bore the title of king. The Hephthalites conquered the whole of Khurasan, until there rose up against them a man of Fars, from the people of Shiraz,

---

281. The Arabic sources on the civil war include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661; al-Ya'qubi, Ta'rīkh, I, 184; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 58–59 (the most detailed account); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195 = § 617; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 408. Of Persian sources, see ʿTabārī-Balʿami, trans. II, 127–28.

282. kana yatadayyaynā, reflecting the fact that, in the civil warfare between the two brothers, Firuz had the support of the Zoroastrian priesthood. Subsequently in his reign, he enforced harsh measures against the Christians and Jews of the empire. See Nöldeke, trans. 118 n. 4; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 130; Christensen, Sassanides, 290–92. Reflecting the state of affairs in the middle of the fifth century, i.e., at this time, al-Mas'ūdī, Tanbih, 193, trans. 147–48, places the Chief Mōbadāth at the head of the social hierarchy in the state, just below the king himself. See Christensen, op. cit., 265, 290.

283. At the time of his first war with the powers of the eastern lands, Firuz's enemies there were probably still the Kidarites, who controlled Balkh, as they were likewise the Persian ruler's foes in his second war of 467, in the opinion of Zeimal, "The Kidarite Kingdom in Central Asia," 125–26, and see n. 275 above. It would thus have been natural for Firuz to have sought aid from the Kidarites' enemies, soon to replace them as the dominant power in Transoxania and Bactria, the Hephthalites, and equally natural that he should fall out with his erstwhile allies once the formidable power of the Hephthalites was firmly established just across his eastern frontiers.

284. This accusation laid against the Hephthalites is also in al-Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 403, cf. Nöldeke, trans. 120 n. 1. In the Shuʿubiyyah controversies of the third/ninth century within the Islamic caliphate, the Arabs asserted that it was the Persians, and especially the Khurāsānians, who had brought the vice into the central lands of the caliphate.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bābak

among whom he was a chief, called Sûkhrâ. Sukhrâ went forth with a band of followers, like a volunteer fighter and one seeking a heavenly reward for his action, until he encountered the ruler of the Hephthalites and expelled him from the land of Khurâsân. The two sides now disengaged and made peace; all those members of Fayrûz’s army who had not by then perished and had been made captive—men, women and children—were repatriated. Fayrûz had reigned for seven years.

Another purveyor of historical traditions other than Hîshâm has stated that Fayrûz was a man of limited capability, generally unsuccessful in his undertakings, who brought down evil and misfortune on his subjects, and the greater part of his sayings and the actions he undertook brought down injury and calamity upon both himself and the people of his realm. During his reign, a great famine came over the land for seven years continuously. Streams, qanâts, and springs dried up; trees and reed beds became dessicated; the major part of all tillage and thickets of vegetation were reduced to dust in the plains and the mountains of his land alike.

285. The form of the name is uncertain, but it appears to have been a family name rather than one of an individual; at all events, Sûkhrâ clearly represented a powerful family of the Shiraz region. In al-Ṭabarî, I, 877–78, 880, pp. 116–18, 120 below, and see n. 298, he is linked with the great family of Qârin and his genealogy given back to legendary Iranian times. See Nöldeke, trans. 120 n. 3.

286. There were actually three wars of Firûz with the powers of the East, in the first two he made no headway, while the third campaign ended in the supreme disaster of his death. In the first campaign, Firûz may have been taken prisoner and later released in exchange for a ransom, paid in part by the Byzantines, on the evidence of the history attributed to Joshua Stylites, The Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite, tr. W. Wright, 8. He was certainly captured at the end of the second campaign, and his son Qubâd/Kawadh, the future king, had to spend two years in the East as a hostage until sufficient ransom money could finally be raised. The third and last campaign was undoubtedly against the Hephthalites proper, who had by now overrun Transoxania and Bactria and were pressing southward over the Hindu Kush into northern India, where there were to appear in Indian chronicles as the “White Huns.” See Litvinsky, “The Hephthalite Empire,” 138–39. Al-Ṭabarî, or his source, was not able to distinguish these three campaigns, but conflated them into one calamitous war that destroyed the Persian king himself and left his country tributary to the Hephthalites for several years.

287. According to Nöldeke, trans 121 n. 1, this new authority for Firûz’s reign is Ibn al-Muqaffa’, who is indeed cited in Ibn Qutaybah’s Uyun al-akhbâr as “the author of the Kitâb siyar al-’Ājam” for Firûz’s débâcle with the Hephthalite king Akhshunwâr, see al-Ṭabarî, I, 874ff., pp. 113ff. below.
bringing about the deaths there of birds and wild beasts; cattle and horses grew so hungry that they could hardly draw any loads; and the water in the Tigris became very sparse. Dearth, hunger, hardship, and various calamities became general for the people of his land. He accordingly wrote to all his subjects, informing them that the land and capitation taxes were suspended, and extraordinary levies \( nā'ībah \)\(^{288} \) and corvées \( sūkhrāh \) were abolished, and that he had given them complete control over their own affairs, commending them to take all possible measures in finding food and sustenance to keep them going. He wrote further to them that anyone who had a subterranean food store \( mātμūrah \), a granary, foodstuffs, or anything that could provide nourishment for the people and enable them to assist each other, should release these supplies, and that no one should appropriate such things exclusively for himself. Furthermore, rich and poor, noble and mean, should share equally and aid each other. He also told them that if he received news that a single individual had died of hunger, he would retaliate upon the people of that town, village, or place where the death from starvation had occurred, and inflict exemplary punishment on them.

In this way, Fayruz ordered the affairs of his subjects during that period of dearth and hunger so adroitly that no one perished of starvation except for one man from the rural district of Ardashīr Khurrah, called Dih. The great men of Persia, all the inhabitants of Ardashīr Khurrah and Fayruz himself considered that as something terrible. Fayruz implored his Lord to bestow His mercy on him and his subjects and to send down His rain \( \text{or, assistance, } g\text{hayth} \) upon them. So God aided him by causing it to rain. Fayruz’s land once more had a profusion of water, just as it had had previously, and the trees were restored to a flourishing state.\(^{289} \)

Fayruz now gave orders for a town to be built near al-Rayy and called it Rām Fayruz; another town between Jurjān and the Gate of \(^{289} \) Firūz employs here what would have been called, in an Arabian context, \( \text{istīsqā',} \) “offering up pleas, prayers [to God] for rain,” and this is in fact the very term used here by al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 59, in his account of Firūz’s measures to relieve the famine and dearth and to restore fertility. See \( \text{EP}, \) s.v. Istīskā’ [T. Fahd and P. N. Boratav].

---

\(^{288} \) See for this meaning, Glossarium, p. DXXXIII.

Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Sūl and called it Rūshan Fayruz; and a third one in the region of Azerbaijan, which he named Shahram Fayruz.²⁹⁰

When Fayruz's land had revived and his kingly rule there was firmly established, when he had inflicted condign violence on his enemies and subdued them, and when he had completed the building of these three towns, he set off with his army for Khurāṣān, with the aim of making war on Akhshunwār, king of the Hephthalites.²⁹¹ When news of this reached Akhshunwār, he

²⁹⁰. F-uuz's building activities are also recorded by al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 59-60, and Ḥamzah al-ʾĪsfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 50 (in the latter source, as far as Hindi!). Rām Fīrūz is mentioned by the Arabic geographers, but they are uncertain whether it was the predecessor of the mediaeval Islamic city of Rhagae/Rayy or a town near it, as al-Ṭabarī states here. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 283; Schwarz, Iran, 744-45. The "Gate of Sūl" guarded the ancient corridor for peoples from the steppe passing via Dihistān and Gurgān on to the Persian plateau. The Sūl in question is possibly the Sūl or Chūl known as a family or tribal name; Marquart, Erānshahr, 51, 73, connected it with Turkish chōl, "steppe, desert," regarded skeptically by Barthold, Four Studies on the History of Central Asia. III. A History of the Turkmen People, 87-88. Von Gutschmid, however, in his "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidendgeschichte," 736, preferred to connect Sūl with the Qaghan of the Western Turks known in Chinese sources as Su-lu and the Arabic ones as Abū Muzāḥīm, r. 717-38. De Blois adduces the MP name for "Sogdian," sūlīg (sughdi > sughli > sūlī). Whatever the origin of this name, the local rulers of Sūl are certainly described as "Turks" at the time of the first Arab probes into Gurgān and Dihistān, i.e., in the mid-first/seventh century; see al-Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 335-36. But the family of these rulers must gradually have become Islamized and integrated into Perso-Islamic life and culture. A Sūl [Er-] Tīgin was a leading commander under the caliphs al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāṭḥiq in the first half of the third/ninth century (al-Ṭabarī, III, 1194, 1313), and the family produced several scholars and adībs in Arabic, most notably Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Sūlī (d. 335/947) (see ELP, s.v. al-Sūlī [S. Leder]).

The Sāsānīds constructed walls across the coastal plain of Gurgān between the Caspian and the inland Elburz mountain chain to keep out the barbarians, including Fīrūz himself (al-Ṭabarī, I, 895, p. 152 below) and Khusraw Anūsharwān [ʾIbn Rustah, Kitāb al-aʿlaq al-nafisah, 150, tr. 173]. Rūshan Fīrūz seems, however, to be the wrong appellation for Fīrūz's foundation in Gurgān, since certain other sources place this in the district of Kaskar on the lower Tigris [see Nöldeke, trans., 123 n. 2]. Later, at I, 894-95, pp. 150-52 below, al-Ṭabarī mentions Khusraw Anūshharwān's stone defenses in the regions of the Sūl and the Alan region of the Caucasus, his quelling of the Sūl people and his settling them at the (already existing?) Shahram (= Shahr Rām) Fīrūz. This last is most likely the correct name for Fīrūz's foundation in Gurgān, especially as there seem to be no other mentions, apart from the one here of a Shahr Rām Fīrūz in Azerbaijan. See Nöldeke, trans. 123 nn. 1-3.

²⁹¹. It is not immediately obvious whether this is a personal name or a title; the Khushnawāz of Firdawsī and other Persian sources looks like an attempt to mold this into an intelligible Persian name. Nöldeke, trans. 123 n. 4, connected the name Akhshunwār with the Loughchas, king of the Kidarites in ca. 485, mentioned
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bābak

was stricken with terror. It is mentioned that one of Akhshunwār’s retainers offered up his life for him and told him, “Cut off my hands and feet and hurl me down in Fayrūz’s way; but look after my children and family.” He intended by this, so it has been mentioned, to trick Fayrūz. Akhshunwār did this to the man, and threw him down in Fayrūz’s way. When Fayrūz passed by him, he was distressed at the man’s state, and asked him what had happened to him. The man informed him that Akhshunwār had done that to him because he had told Akhshunwār that he would be unable to stand up against the Persian troops. Fayrūz accordingly felt pity and compassion for him, and ordered him to be carried with him. The man told Fayrūz, by way of advice, so it is alleged, that he would show him and his followers a short cut, which no one had ever previously used, to get to the king of the Hephthalites. Fayrūz was taken in by this trickery, and he and his troops set off along the route the mutilated man had told him about. They kept on floundering through one desert after another, and whenever they complained of thirst, the man would tell them that they were near to water and had almost crossed the desert. Finally, when the man had brought them to a place where, he knew, they could neither go forward nor back, he revealed to them what he had done. Fayrūz’s retainers said to him, “We warned you about this man, O King, but you would not be warned. Now we can only go forward until we encounter the enemy, whatever the circumstances may be.” So they pressed ever onward; thirst killed the greater part of them, and Fayrūz went on with the survivors against the enemy. When they contemplated the state to which they had been reduced, they appealed to Akhshunwār for a peace by the Byzantine historian Priscus (see on this Greek rendering, Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica. II, 165–66), and this was followed up by Ghirshman, who adduced a coin of Firūz’s with the counterstamp of a ruler called Akūn, which he connected with Kougchas; see his Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 87–88. The name looks like a distinctly Iranian one, and certainly not a Turkish one, and Henning put forward the view that it was a title, which should be read as ’kh.sh.n.dar – Sogdian ‘xš’wndr “power holder”; see his “Neue Materialen zur Geschichte des Manichäismus,” 17 n. 2. Widengren, however, saw no need to amend the w of the ending of the name, and suggested that it represents Sogdian ‘xš’wnwr “power bearer”; see his “Xosrau Anosûrân, les Hephtalites et les peuples turcs. Etude préliminaire des sources,” 75 n. 1. agreement, on the basis that he would allow them freely to return to their homeland, while Fayrūz would promise Akhshunwār, with an oath and an agreement sworn before God, that he would never in the future mount raids against him, covet his territories, or send against him an army to make war on them. Fayrūz further undertook to establish a boundary between the two kingdoms, which he would not cross. Akhshunwār was content with these promises. Fayrūz wrote for him a document, properly sealed and with his obligations guaranteed by professional witnesses. Akhshunwār then allowed him to depart, and he returned home.

However, once Fayrūz arrived back in his kingdom, overweening pride and uncontrollable rashness led him to renew the war with Akhshunwār. He led an attack on Akhshunwār, despite the advice of his viziers and his close advisers against this, since it involved breaking the agreement; but he rejected their words and would only persist in following his own judgment. Among those who counseled against this course of action was a man called Muzdubwadh (?) who was especially close to Fayrūz and whose opinion Fayrūz used to seek out. When Muzdubwadh perceived Fayrūz's firm determination, he set down what had passed between him and the king in a document, which he asked Fayrūz to seal.

Fayrūz now set off on his expedition toward Akhshunwār's territory. Akhshunwār had dug a great trench [khandaq] between his own and Fayrūz's territory. When Fayrūz came to this, he threw bridges across it and set up on them banners which would be guiding markers for him and his troops on the way back home, and then crossed over to confront the enemy. When Akhshunwār came up to their encampment, he publicly adduced before Fayrūz the document with the agreement he had written for Akhshunwār, and warned him about his oath and his undertaking; but Fayrūz rejected this and only persisted in his contentiousness and

292. The narrative emphasizes Firūz's personal responsibility, as the breaker of his oath, for the ensuing catastrophe; but as Nöldeke skeptically observes, if Firūz had been victorious, all mention of his oath-breaking would have been tossed aside!

293. That is, so that the record should be clear, that he had opposed Firūz's planned attack and was thus in no way responsible for the consequences.
squaring up to his opponent. Each one of them addressed his opponent in lengthy speeches, but in the end, they became enmeshed in the toils of war. Fayruz’s followers were, however, in a weakened and defeatist state because of the agreement that had existed between them and the Hephthalites. Akhshunwär brought forth the document Fayruz had written out for him and raised it up on the tip of a lance, calling out, “O God, act according to what is in this document!” Fayruz was routed, mistook the place where the standards had been set up [as markers], fell into the trench, and perished. Akhshunwär seized Fayruz’s baggage, his womenfolk, his wealth, and his administrative bureaus (dāwāwīnuhu). The Persian army suffered a defeat the like of which they had never before experienced.

There was in Sijistān a man of the Persians, from the people of the district of Ardashir Khurrah, who had insight, strength in battle, and bravery, and who was called Sūkhhrā. He had with him a detachment of cavalrymen. When he received the news about Fayruz, he rode off that same night, traveling as far as he could, till he came up with Akhshunwär. He sent a messenger, announcing to him his intention of making war and threatening him with destruction and ruin. Akhshunwär dispatched a mighty army against Sūkhhrā. When the two sides met, Sūkhhrā rode out against them, and found them eager for battle. It is said that he shot an arrow at a man who had ridden out to attack him; the arrow struck the latter’s horse between the eyes and became almost totally sunk in its head. The horse fell down dead, and Sūkhhrā was able to capture its rider. Sūkhhrā spared his life, and instructed him to go back to his master and inform him about what he had seen. The [Hephthalite] troops went back to Akhshunwär bearing with them the horse’s corpse. When Akhshunwär saw the effects of the arrow shot, he was amazed, and sent a message to Sūkhhrā, saying, “Ask whatever you want!” Sūkhhrā told him, “I want you to return to me the government exchequer (al-diwan) and to release the captives: The king did that. When Sūkhhrā had taken possession of the ex-

294. That is, bring down upon Firuz the stipulated curse for his breaking the agreement he had made with Akhshunwär.

295. Presumably the Sūkhhrā mentioned by al-Ṭabari, I, 873, pp. 110-11 above, as from Fārs, Ardashir Khurrah being the district in which Shirāz lay.
chequer and had secured the release of the captives, he extracted from the exchequer records a certified statement of the monies that Fayruz had had with him, and then wrote to Akhshunwar that he was not going to leave without this money. When Sūkhrā's determination became apparent to Akhshunwar, he purchased his freedom (i.e., from the threatenings of Sūkhrā, by handing over the missing money).

Sūkhrā was able thus to return to the Persian land after rescuing the captives and after getting hold of the exchequer, with the money and all the contents of the treasuries that had been with Fayruz, now given back. When he arrived back to the Persians, they received him with great honor, extolled his feats, and raised him to a lofty status such as none but kings were able to attain after him. He was Sūkhrā, son of Wisebūr, son of Z.han, son of Narsi, son of Wisebūr, son of Qārin, son of K.wān, son of 'b.y.d, son of 'w.b.y.d, son of Tīrūyah, son of K.r.d.n.k, son of Nāw.r, son of Tūs, son of Nawdhar, son of M.n.shū, son of Nawdar, son of Manūshirh. 398

396. Reading, with the Sprenger ms., thabat (or thubūt), "certification, record," as in n. b, for the text's buyūt.
397. For Wihshāpūr, as in Nöldeke, trans. 127 n. 1.
398. Text, N.w.d.kā. The Addenda, p. dxci, refer back to the name Tūs, son of Nawdharān, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 601, amended there by the editor from the form in the Bundahīshn and the Shāh-nāmah, the name Nawdhar being in Persian legendary history the son and successor of king Manūchīhr, killed by Afrāsīyāb. See Nöldeke, Das iranische Nationallepos, 8–9; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 373, 404, 435. The Naōtara/Nawdhar were, in fact, one of the great princely houses of legendary history, figuring in the Avesta. From the time of Wīstāspa onward—apparently through Wīstāspa's marriage connection with Hutaosā, of the Naōtara—the Naōtara were reckoned as the royal house, now prominent in the national epic. See Christensen, Les Kayanides, 23–25; Yarshater, op. cit., 413, 460–61; and on the family name, appearing in the Avesta as the eponymous epithet naōtairya-, see Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 228, regarding it as of uncertain origin.

This impressive genealogy for Sūkhrā, going back to mythological times, indicates the importance of the family and places it as one of the great Arsacid families, that of Qārin or Qārin, which was to survive the Islamic conquest of Persia and play a role in Islamic history for some two centuries further. Qārin, son of Sūkhrā, received from the Sāsānīd monarch lands in Ṭabaristān, the Wandā-Ummid Kūh in the hinterland of Amul, and in early Islamic times the Qārinid principality may have been centered on Fīrīm. The most famed representative of the line in the Islamic period was Māzūr b. Qārin, then only a recent convert to Islam, who rebelled against the Tāhrid governors of Khurāsān in the caliphate of al-Mu'taṣim and was executed in 225/840, with the line disappearing from history after this point. See al-Ṭabarī, III, 1268–98; Nöldeke, trans. 127 n. 2, 438 Excursus 3; EI1, s.v.
Another authority knowledgeable about the historical narratives of the Persians has mentioned the story of Fayruz and Akhshunwar in similar terms to what I have just recounted, except that he has stated that when Fayruz set out and headed toward Akhshunwar, he appointed as his deputy over the cities of Ctesiphon and Bahurasur—the two royal residences—this person Sukhra. He related: The latter was called, on account of his rank, Qarin, and used to be governor of Sijistan as well as of the two cities. Fayruz came to a tower (manārah) Bahram Jür had constructed in the zone between the border of the land of Khurasan and the land of the Turks in order that the latter should not cross the frontier into Khurāsān—all this in accordance with the covenant between the Turks and the Persians providing that each side should renounce transgressing the other's frontiers. Fayruz likewise had made an agreement with Akhshunwar not to pass beyond the tower into the land of the Hephthalites.

[After reaching the tower,) Fayruz gave orders, and had fifty elephants plus three hundred men linked together, and had it (sc., the tower) dragged forward, while he came along behind it. He intended by means of this to assert that he had ostensibly kept faith with Akhshunwar regarding his agreement with him. Akhshunwar got news of what Fayruz was up to in connection with that tower. He sent an envoy to Fayruz with the message, "Desist, O Fayruz, from what your forefathers abandoned, and don't embark on what they didn't attempt to do!" Fayruz took no notice of his words and Akhshunwar's message left him unmoved. He began to try and tempt Akhshunwar into a direct military

---

Māzyār (V. Minorsky); EP, sv. Kārinids (M. Rekaya).

299. In this version, Firūz's enemies in the East have become not Hephthalites but Turks, and Firūz’s offense consists in advancing beyond the tower that Bahram Gūr had set up as a boundary between the two powers. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 128 n. 3.

300. Al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwal, 60, has Shūkhar for this name and also states that Firūz was accompanied on the expedition by, among others, the Chief Mōbadh.

301. Nöldeke, trans 128 n. 4, notes that Greek sources also tend to attach family or clan names, associated with great offices in the state, to the offices themselves.

302. The Cairo text, II, 96, has fa-suffida “were linked together,” with the same meaning as the Leiden text’s fa-dumida.

303. That is, by not leading the attack on Akhshunwar directly from the front of his troops.
engagement and summoned him to this, but Akhshunwär kept on holding back and showing an aversion for this, because the Turks’ method of warfare consists for the most part in trickery, deceitfulness, and stratagems. Furthermore, Akhshunwär ordered a trench to be dug behind the lines of his own army, ten cubits wide and twenty cubits deep. He had light branches of wood laid over it and then had it covered with earth. Then he retired with his troops to a spot not too far away. Fayruz received news of Akhshunwär’s departure from his encampment with his troops, and had no doubt that this meant Akhshunwär’s withdrawal and flight. He ordered the drums to be beaten, and rode out at the head of his troops in pursuit of Akhshunwär and his followers. They rushed forward impetuously, heading directly toward that trench. But when they reached it, they rushed blindly on to the trench’s covering. Fayruz and the whole mass of his army fell into the pit and perished to the last man. Akhshunwär wheeled round to Fayruz’s encampment and took possession of everything there. He took captive the Chief Móbadh, and among Fayruz’s womenfolk who fell into his hands was Fayruzdukht, his daughter. Akhshunwär gave orders for the corpses of Fayruz and all those who had fallen into that trench with him to be retrieved, and they were laid out on funerary structures (al-nawawís). Akhshunwär sent for Fayruzdukht, wishing to join with her in sexual congress, but she refused.

305. Literally, “daughter of Firuz”; cf. Justi, Namenbuch, 250, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 761. As Nöldeke, trans. 130 n. 2 notes, her true name would not be known outside the royal harem and its circle of attendants.

306. In conformity thereby with the Zoroastrian practice of exposing corpses to the air rather than inhumation. The nawawís would be hastily assembled, temporary structures for dealing with large numbers of the slain, corresponding to the more permanent dakhmas or “towers of silence.”

307. Nöldeke, trans 130 n. 3, notes that this is a distortion of the apparent truth, meant here to emphasize Persian royal pride. According to Ps.-Joshua Stylites, Chronicle, trans. 15–16, the victorious Akhshunwär took Firuz’s daughter into his harem, and she gave birth to a daughter who subsequently married her own paternal uncle Kawadh, son of Firuz; the king’s daughter was obviously not given back with any other royal womenfolk.
When the news of Fayruz's death reached the Persian lands, the people were thrown into perturbation and terror. However, when Sukhra became convinced of the exact truth of Fayruz's fate, he got ready and advanced with the greater part of the troops at his disposal against the Hephthalite lands. When Sukhra reached Jurjan, Akhshunwär received news of his expedition to attack him, so he prepared for war and moved toward engaging Sukhra in battle, and at the same time he sent to Sukhra asking him about his intentions and enquiring what his name and his official position were. Sukhra sent back the message that he was a man with the personal name of Sukhra and the official rank of Qārin, and that his intention in marching against Akhshunwär was to take vengeance on him for Fayruz's death. Akhshunwär returned a message to him: "Your way of proceeding in this affair you have undertaken is exactly like Fayruz's was, since despite the numerosness of his troops, the sole consequence of his attacking me was his own destruction and perdition." But Akhshunwär's words did not deter Sukhra, and he paid no heed to them. He gave orders to his troops, and they got ready for battle and girded on their weapons. He moved forward against Akhshunwär, advancing with firm determination and a keen mind (literally, "heart"). Akhshunwär sought a truce and a peace agreement with Sukhra, but the latter refused to contemplate any peace agreement with him unless he could recover everything Akhshunwär had appropriated from Fayruz's encampment. So Akhshunwär returned to him everything he had seized from Fayruz's camp, including his treasuries, the contents of his stables, and his womenfolk, including Fayruzdukht, and he handed back to him the Chief Mobadh and every single one of the great men of the Persians in his possession. Sukhra then went back to the land of the Persians with all that.

---

308. The Arabic sources on Firuz's last campaign and Sukhra's putative campaign of vengeance include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'dīrīf, 661–62; idem, 'Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 117–21 (from the Kitāb siyar al-'Ajam); al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, I, 184–85; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 60; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195 – § 617, placing the battle in which the Persian monarch was killed at Marw al-Rūdh, whereas Firdawsi places it in the vicinity of Marw; Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 408–409. The Persian ones include Tabari-Bal'ami, trans. II, 131–44. Nöldeke, trans. 131 n. 2, saw in the campaign of Sukhra a reminiscence of Bahram Gur's campaigns in the East, and in his Das iranische Nationalepos, 9, drew attention to the role of Sukhra
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

The authorities differ concerning [the length of] Fayruz's reign. Some say it was twenty-six years, others twenty-one years.309

Mention of Events in the Reigns of Yazdajird (II), Son of Bahrām (V), and Fayruz and the Relations of Their Respective Governors with the Arabs and the People of Yemen310

Information was transmitted to me from Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: The sons of the nobles of Ḥīmyar and others from the Arab tribes used to serve the kings of Ḥīmyar during their as retriever of the military situation and restorer of Persian national honor after Firuz's ill-omen actions had abased it, and he mentioned the parallel role of the house of Qārin (to which al-Ṭabārī attaches Sūkhra; see above) in Iranian legendary history, possibly an attempt to glorify the house of Qārin by giving it a splendid part in the nation's remote past. Christensen, Sassanides, 296, notes that the whole episode of Sūkhra's campaign of revenge against the Hephthalite king is unmentioned in the contemporary sources [i.e., the Christian chroniclers], and may likewise have been a patriotic Persian invention by circles unwilling to accept the possibility of such a dismal defeat for Firuz, especially when the latter had been the darling of the Zoroastrian clergy. Of Byzantine sources on the wars with the Hephthalites, Procopius, The Persian War, i.iii.1–iv.35 is detailed but inclined very much to the anecdotal, with undue space devoted to, e.g., the story of a pearl earring of Firuz's; see Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 154–55. Agathias, however, has a more lively account, influenced by Syrian and Armenian traditions very hostile to Firuz; see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 152–54. Of modern studies on the wars, see Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephthalites, 87–90; K. Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l'Asie Centrale aux 5e et 6e siècles," 438–40; Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 138–40.

309. Firuz I's reign was 459–84; hence more like twenty-six [lunar] years. His name appears on his coins as [KDY] PYRWCY, i.e., [Kay] Peroz. See on his coins Paruck, Sassanien Coins, 63, 367–70, 452–57, Plate XVI, Table XIV; Göbl, Sassanian Numismatics, 49–50, Table IX; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sassanian Coins, 21, 123–27; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sassanian Numismatics," 236.

310. From this point, I, 880 l. 17 to 882, l. 4, Nöldeke did not bother to translate, considering the events narrated there as too "fabelhafte" (but see regarding such omissions, Translator's Foreword, p. xvi above).
122 Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Among those who served Ḥassān b. Tubba' was 'Amr b. Ḥuṣr al-Kindī, the chief of Kindah during his time. When Ḥassān b. Tubba' led an expedition against the Jadis, he appointed 'Amr as his deputy over certain affairs. When 'Amr b. Tubba' killed his brother Hassan b. Tubba' and

311. The earliest firm mention of Ḥimyar (Sabaic hmyr) and the Ḥimyarites comes from Pliny the Elder in the late first century A.D., but it is unclear whether the term originally denoted an ethnic identity or a grouping of diverse ethnic elements. It then appears, in what is probably the next century, in the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, where is mentioned Charibael “king of the two nations (ethnē), the Homeritae and the Sabaeans.” In the first centuries A.D., the Ḥimyarites seem to have been led by minor princes, qayls, and chiefs, rather than kings. Only in the sixth century do we find epigraphic evidence for kings of Ḥimyar, when the Ḥiṣn al-Ghurāb inscription [CIH 621] speaks of their being killed by the Abyssinians. See Beeston, “The Himyarite Problem,” 1-7.

312 Kindah (kdt - kndt in the South Arabian inscriptions, with assimilation of the intervocalic n) was the great Arabian tribe which, according to Arab tradition, migrated from Ḥaḍramawt to central Arabia, though this may be an inversion of what actually happened. It was accordingly accounted South Arabian in nasab by the overwhelming majority of genealogists [see for certain exceptions to these, Kister and Plessner, “Notes on Caskel’s Gamharat an-nasab,” 58-59]. Certainly, in the third century A.D., Kindah was established in southwestern Najd with their center at Qaryat al-Faw, an important settlement on the main caravan route from Yemen and Najrān northward to Najd [see A. R. al-Ansary, Qaryat al-Faw. A Portrait of Pre-Islamic Civilisation in Saudi Arabia]; they appear in recorded history as nomad auxiliaries of the kings of Saba, and then, after ca. A.D. 275, of the Ḥimyarite kings. In the second half of the fifth century, Kindah are found further to the north in Najd, with what seems to have been a semipermanent camp/capital at Baṭn ’Aqil [localized by U. Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der altarabischen Poesie, 29, in the wadi of that name, an affluent of the Wādī al-Rummah, to the west of modern ’Unayzah and Buraydah] under the celebrated Ḥuṣr b. Ṭamr, called Akil al-Muṭr [on this cognomen, n. 408 see below]. It seems that, as part of the general policy of extending Ḥimyarite power into central Arabia at this time, this chief of Kindah was placed in power as a “king” (in fact, merely a tribal chief) over the local Arab tribes there of Ma’add. The Arab historical tradition makes the Ḥimyarite ruler involved here either the Tubba’ As‘ad Abī Karib or his son Ḥassān [in the South Arabian inscriptions, ḥṣrn] Ḫuḥa‘min, whose reigns should be placed, according to the inscriptions, in the second quarter of the fifth century. As well as appearing in the Arabian historical tradition, it now seems likely that Akil al-Muṭr is the “Ḥuṣr b. Ṭamr, king (mlk) of Kiddat” of a Sabaean rock inscription found near Kawkbaw, roughly half-way between Najrān and al-Faw [see Iwona Gażda, “Ḥuṣr b. Ṭamr roi de Kinda et l’établissement de la domination Ḥimyarite en Arabie centrale,” 65-73]. The fortunes of Kindah were thus for long connected with the rulers of South Arabia, until the fall of the Ḥimyarites under Abyssinian pressure deflected many elements of the tribe in southwestern Najd into Ḥaḍramawt. See, in general, Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 233, II, 47-53, 371-2; G. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda of the Family of Akil al-Muṭr, 32-50; Chr. Robin, in idem [ed.], L’Arabie antique de Karīb’il ā assumed the royal power in his stead, he took 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindi into his personal service. 'Amr b. Ḥujr was a man of sound judgment and sagacity. 'Amr b. Tubba' intended to honor him and at the same time to diminish the status of his brother Ḥassān's sons, and as part of this policy he gave Ḥassān b. Tubba's daughter in marriage to 'Amr b. Ḥujr. The Himyarites grumbled at this, and among them were some young men who were concerned about her, because none of the Arabs had previously been bold enough to desire a marriage alliance with that house (sc., the Himyarites).

---

Hujr's son 'Amr, mentioned here, had the cognomen al-Maggur, apparently because he was "limited, confined" to his father's sphere of power and unable to expand it (regarding his personal qualities, al-Tabari, below, stresses his judgment and sagacity). He succeeded Ḥujr in the main center of Kindi authority, Najd, with another branch of the family under his brother Mu'awiyah al-Jawn controlling the eastern Najd regions of Yamamah, Hajar and Bahrayn. See Olinder, op. cit., 47–50, and nn. 314, 408 below.

313. This was one of the extinct tribes of the Arabs, al-'Arab al-bḍiḍah, according to Arabic lore and legend, which relates that Jadis and his brother Thamūd were three generations after Sām b. Nūḥ, i.e., Noah's son Shem. The story goes that Jadis, living in Yamamah, rebelled against the tyranny of a sister tribe, Tāsm, but that the sole survivors of the latter called in Ḥassān Tubba', whose army exterminated the Jadis. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 215, 217, 219–221, 771–75; Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I. 40; EP, s.v. Ṭasm (W. P. Heinrichs).

314. Tubba', with the Arabic broken plural Tabābī'ah, is used by writers of Islamic times as a dynastic title (comparable to Fir'awn, pl. Far'ānāh, for the Pharaohs of Egypt and Kisrā, pl. Akāsirah, for the Sāsānīd kings [on this last title, see n. 374 below], etc.) for this line of Himyarite rulers who controlled the southwestern part of Arabia from the late third century A.D. to the early sixth century. It is probably true that Tubba' was a title rather than a personal name, but its meaning and/or etymology are unknown; the explanations of the Arabic lexicographers (see Lane, Lexicon, 295b–c) can be disregarded. At all events, ca. 275 the Himyarite Shamir Yūr'ish or Yuhar'ish overthrew the Sabaean rulers in Yemen, together with the independent rulers in Ḥḍramawt, and constituted himself "king of Saba and Dhū Raydān and of Ḥḍramawt and Ymmt" (see further on him, al-Ṭabarī, I, 890, p. 142 and n. 364 below). Almost all the Tubba' rulers mentioned by Islamic authors, most notably by al-Ḩasan b. Ahmad al-Hamdānī (d. 334/945) in his Ikhlīṣ, can be validated from South Arabian inscriptions, but there remain lacunae, and a definitive dynastic list cannot be worked out. See Beeston, "Ḥamdānī and the Tabābī'ah," 5–15; EP, s.v. Tubba' (A. F. L. Beeston).

'Amr b. Tubba'’s patronage of ‘Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindi further illustrates the closeness of the links between Kindah and the kings of Himyar, as does his giving in marriage his own niece to ‘Amr b. Ḥujr, mentioned a few lines below. Cf. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 48, who is unnecessarily skeptical about this marriage.
Hassān b. Tubba' s daughter bore al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr to 'Amr b. Ḥujr.

After 'Amr b. Tubba', 'Abd Kulāl b. Muthawwib succeeded to the royal power. This was because the sons of Hassān were only small, except for Tubba' b. Hassān, whom the jinn had rendered mentally unbalanced. Hence Abū Kulāl b. Muthawwib assumed the royal power [temporarily], fearing lest someone outside the royal house of the kingdom might covet it. He was qualified to exercise this power through his mature years, his experience, and his excellent powers of governing. According to what has been mentioned, he was an adherent of the original form of Christianity ('alā din al-Naṣrāniyyah al-ūlā), but used to conceal this from his people. He had been converted to that faith by a man of Ghassān who had come from Syria, but whom the Ḥimyarites had then attacked and killed.\textsuperscript{315}

At that point, Tubba' b. Hassān recovered his sanity and was restored to health. He was highly knowledgeable about the stars, the most intelligent among those who had learned [the sciences] in his time, and the one with the most information and lore concerning both the past and what was to come after him in the future. Hence Tubba' b. Hassān b. Tubba' b. Malikay Karib b. Tubba' al-Aqran was raised to the kingship. Ḥimyar and the Arabs stood in intense awe of him. He then sent his sister's son al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindī at the head of a powerful army against the lands of Ma'add,\textsuperscript{316} al-Ḥirah, and the districts adjacent to them both. Al-Ḥārith marched against al-Nu'mān b. Imri' al-Qays b. al-Shaqiqah and fought with him; al-Nu'mān and a number of his family were killed, and his companions were routed. Only al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān al-Akbar,\textsuperscript{317} whose mother was Mā' al-

\textsuperscript{315} That is, by al-Nu'mān I b. Imri' al-Qays II [r. ca. 400–18]. See Rothstein, \textit{Lahymiden}, 52, 65–68, 70.

\textsuperscript{316} Ma'add is a general designation for the North Arab tribes in Islamic times, as is also that of his father Adnān and his son Nizār. Ma'add was originally, in pre-Islamic times, a tribal group in central Arabia, presumably the Nizār of the Namārah inscription of A.D. 328, and then in the early sixth century the Ma'add are mentioned in South Arabian inscriptions as the North Arab subjects of Kindah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, \textit{Jamharat al-nasab}, I, Table 1, II, 1–2, 379; \textit{EP}, s.v. Ma'add (W. M. Watt).

\textsuperscript{317} That is, al-Mundhir I b. al-Nu'mān I [r. ca. 418–76]. See Rothstein, \textit{Lahymiden}, 53, 68–70.
Samā', a woman of the Banū al-Namir, managed to escape from al-Ḥārīth. In this way the royal power of the house of al-Nu'mān passed away, and al-Ḥārīth b. Ṭābi'ī succeeded to their former power and possessions.

Hishām related: After al-Nu'mān, his son al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān succeeded to the royal power, al-Mundhir's mother being Hind bt. Zayd Manāt b. Zayd Allāh b. 'Amr al-Ghassānī, for forty-four years, of which eight years and nine months fell within 318. The Namir b. Qāṣīṣ were a minor tribe of Rabi'ah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 141, II, 444; Ibn Durayd, Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq, 334-35.

---

319. Al-Ḥārīth b. Ṭābi'ī al-Maqṣūr (fl. in the first thirty years or so of the sixth century) was a dominating personality on the political and military scene of Arabia and the adjacent fringes of the Byzantine and Persian lands. The Lakhmids and the chiefs of Kindah had had connections, despite being rivals for the control of northern and eastern Arabia; already in the later fifth century al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir I had married a daughter, Umm al-Malik, of the Kindi 'Amr b. Ḥuṣain Akil al-Murār.

The campaign against the Lakhmids mentioned here was preceded by an attack on the Byzantine frontiers in Syria led by two of al-Ḥārīth's sons, Ḥuṣain and Ma'di Karib, in ca. 500, forcing the Greeks to agree to a peace treaty in 502. According to the South Arabian tradition of Ibn al-Kalbī and the Bakri tribal one set forth in Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad al-Anbārī's commentary on the Mufaddalīyyāt poetical anthology, al-Ḥārīth and the Rabi'ah attacked al-Nu'mān b. Ma'ākbar, al-Mundhir's father, and then al-Ḥārīth became head of the Arabs of Iraq. This accords grosso modo with the South Arabian tradition of Ibn al-Kalbī also given here by al-Tabārī, that al-Nu'mān was killed but his son al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu'mān II b. Ma'ār Sa'mā' managed to escape. All other Arabic traditions are concerned only with al-Mundhir, variously described as the son of Imru' al-Qays, of al-Nu'mān, and of Ma'ār Sa'mā', and not with his father. Concerning the date of the event, the Ps.-Joshua the Stylite, Chronicle, trans. 45-46, states that the Arab (i.e., Kindi) invasion of the Lakhmid lands took place when al-Nu'mān was away with the Persian army combatting the Greeks, which would place an attack by al-Ḥārīth on al-Ḥirah in 503. It is probable that the Kindi ruler was then able to control the greater part of the Lakhmid dominions from 503 till 506, the years when the Byzantine-Persian war was at its most intense, and Kawad was unable to afford the Lakhmids any assistance. According to the Bakri tradition again, al-Mundhir, bereft of Persian help, had to agree to marry al-Ḥārīth's daughter Hind, who, as a Christian, was subsequently held in great honor at al-Ḥirah and was the founder of a monastery in the region of al-Ḥirah, the Dayr Hind (al-Ṣughra); see al-Shābushāni, Kitāb al-diyyārāt, 244-46, and n. 914 below. See for these events, Rothstein, Lahmidīn, 69-71, 87ff.; Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 57-63; S. Smith, “Events in Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 445-46; EP, s.v. Kinda [Irfan Shahid]. For the general background of relations between Byzantium and Kindah, Shahid, “Byzantium and Kinda,” 57-63.

320. As Rothstein pointed out, Lahmidīn, 68, this nasab does not necessarily imply that Hind was a princess of the Jafnid/Ghassānid royal house in Syria; there were members of Ghassān living in al-Ḥirah, e.g., the Al Buqaylah.
126 Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābāk

the time of Bahram (V) Jūr, son of Yazdajird (I), eighteen years fell within the time of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahram, and seventeen years within the time of Fayruz b. Yazdajird (II). After him there reigned his son al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Hirr bt. al-Nu'mān from the descendants of al-Hayjumānah bt. 'Amr b. Abi Rabī'ah b. Dhuḥl b. Shaybān.321 It was he whom the Persians imprisoned. [He reigned for] twenty years, of which ten years fell within the time of Fayruz, son of Yazdajird (II), four years in the time of Balāsh, son of Yazdajird (II), and six years in the time of Qubādh, son of Fayruz.322

[Balāsh]

Then there succeeded to the royal power after Fayruz, son of Yazdajird (II), his son Balāsh.323

[He was] the son of Fayruz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahram (V) Jūr. His brother Qubādh had disputed the succession with him, but Balāsh had emerged victorious and Qubādh had fled to Khāqān, king of the Turks, seeking his help and military aid.324 When the crown was placed on Balāsh’s head, the great men of state and the nobles gathered round him, hailed him with congratulations, and invoked divine blessings on him. They requested him to re-

321. Nöldeke, trans. 133 n. 1, thought that the unusual name al-Hayjumānah (found in ancient Arab onomastic in both masculine and feminine forms) stemmed from Greek hegoumenē or hegemon, and this seems very probable.

322. The reign of al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir I is poorly documented, but must have fallen substantially within the third quarter of the fifth century and just beyond it, apparently from 462 onward in Rothstein’s computation. The lists of the Lakhmid kings in the Arabic sources, where they mention al-Aswad (here from Ibn al-Kalbī, and also in al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, III, 300 – § 1060) accord in giving him a reign of twenty years, which would take his reign up to 482. See Rothstein, Lahrīnīdīn, 55, 70.

323. Correctly, the brother of Fayruz and not his son. See Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 295. On the name Balāsh/Walāsh, see n. 31 above.

324. Some sources, both Christian and Muslim, mention two flights of Kawād from Walāsh to the rulers of the East, others only one. He had certainly been a hostage for two years with the Hephthalite king Akhsunwar, according to al-Ya‘qūbī and other authorities. Further sources state, however, that Walāsh had to struggle for the succession of his father’s death with another brother, Zārēr. See Nöldeke, trans. 133 n. 6.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

ward Sūkhrā for what he had done, so Balāsh marked him out as one of his special favorites, honored him and gave him rich presents.325 Balāsh invariably behaved in a praiseworthy manner and had an intense care for the prosperity of the land. His laudable concern for this reached the extent that, whenever he heard of the ruin of a house and the flight of its inhabitants, he would punish the owner of the village326 because of his lack of lively concern for them and lack of relief for their need, so that they would not have been compelled to abandon their homes. He built in the Sawād a city he called Balāshawādh, which is Sābāt near al-Madā'in.327 His reign lasted four years.328

325. Sūkhrā was clearly a dominant influence during Walāsh's short reign. It may well be that Sūkhrā and his son Zārmīhr, mentioned just below, are one and the same person. See Nöldeke, trans. 134 n. 1.

326. sāhib al-qaryah, i.e., the dihqān, a member of the lesser nobility of rural and small-town landowners.

327. This is a false equation of the two places mentioned, which extracts a fictitious name from the later port of Balāshabād; a genuine Sābāt, Sābāt al-Madā'in, in Persian, Walāshabād, existed as the port of Ctesiphon from Arsacid times, having been founded by Vologeses I (r. ca. A.D. 51–80), whose name really lies behind al-Ṭabarī's Balāshawādh. See Nöldeke, trans. 134 n. 4; Fiey, "Topographie chrétienne de Mahoze," 398–99.

328. Walāsh's reign was 484–88. His name appears on his coins as [HWKDY] WLK'S, i.e., Hu Kay Walakhsh. See on his coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 63–64, 370–73, 457–59, Plates XVI–XVII, Table XVI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 50–51, Table X, Plate 11; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 128–29; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

Of the other Arabic sources on his reign, al-Ya'qubi, al-Dinawari, and al-Mas'ūdī merely give his name and the length of his reign. Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 610, mentions him in connection with a popular proverb, biʿījam Sābat, and 662–63 in regard to his brief reign and his deposition in favor of his brother Qubād. Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, Taʿrikh, 50, notes that he built Balāshabād and another town near Ḥulwān called Balāshfarr [read thus for the text's Balāsh'ī]. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, 1, 411. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, trans. II, 144–46. For modern studies of his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 295–96; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 149, 178.

Despite Walāsh's good rule, he was overthrown and blinded by a conspiracy of the great men of state and the Zoroastrian clergy; Ps.-Joshua the Styliste, Chronicle, trans. 12–13, says that the clergy hated him and condemned him for introducing public baths into Persia, presumably because it was a foreign, Roman practice and such use of water profaned one of the sacred elements of creation. His measures had perhaps clashed with the interests of the aristocracy and the dihqāns, while his conciliatory policy toward the Christians had aroused the ire of the priesthood of the state church. See Nöldeke, trans. 134 n. 5; Labourd, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 154.
Then there succeeded to the royal power Qubadh, son of Fayruz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahram (V) Jur.\textsuperscript{329} Before Qubadh attained the throne, he had fled to Khagān, seeking help from him against his brother Balash. On his way there, he passed through the vicinity of Naysābūr, accompanied by a small band of companions fleeing with him in disguise. Among these was Zarmihr, son of Sūkhrā. Qubadh had an intense desire for sexual satisfaction, complained about this to Zarmihr, and asked the latter to seek out a wife of good family (\textit{dhat hasab}) for him.\textsuperscript{330} Zarmihr did that, and went along to the wife of his major-domo (\textit{sāhib manzilihi}), who was one of his cavalrymen; she had a virgin daughter, of outstanding beauty. He asked her, as a sincere friend, for her daughter, and indicated to her that he would send her along to Qubadh. The wife told her husband about that, while Zarmihr kept on setting forth to the two of them how attractive a proposition it was and spelling out to them how alluring a prospect it was for them, until finally they consented. The girl, who was called Niwandukht,\textsuperscript{331} came to Qubadh; he lay with her that very night, and she became pregnant with Anusharwan.\textsuperscript{332} He ordered for her \textsuperscript{329} Qubadh is the Arabized form of MP Kawād, Greek form Kabatēs, on his coins KW'T and KDY KW'T, i.e., [Kay] Kawād, which goes back to Kawi Kawāta, the legendary founder of the Kayānīd dynasty. Following Nöldeke, Christensen, \textit{Les Kayanides}, 40–41, and \textit{Sasanides}, 350–51, noted the increasing popularity from the fifth century onward of personal names from Persian legendary history and that it was from this time that the legendary, epic history assumed the form as we know it in the \textit{Xwaday-nāmag}. See Nöldeke, trans. 135 n. 1, 147 n. 1; Justi, \textit{Namenbuch}, 159–60; Mayrhofer, \textit{Die altiranischen Namen}, no. 209; Gignoux, \textit{Noms propres sassanides}, no. 493; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 374.

\textsuperscript{330} Necessary for her, since she was to be the mother of the great Anūsharwān. For the name Zarmihr ("golden Mithra"), see Justi, \textit{Namenbuch}, 383; P. Gignoux, \textit{Noms propres sassanides}, no. 1082. The historicity of this whole episode of Kawād's flight to the Khagān of the Turks during his brother Balāsh's reign is, however, difficult to accept, and may be a confusion arising from the fact of Kawād's undoubted one, probably two, stays among the Hephthalites. The begetting of Anusharwan at Nishābūr must, at all events, be pure fable.

\textsuperscript{331} Following the reading of this name by Nöldeke in text, n. a; cf. his trans. 502. Justi, \textit{Namenbuch}, 228–29, interpreted Newandukht as "daughter of heroes."

\textsuperscript{332} Anūshrawān or Anūsharwān (the most common form of the name in later Islamic times), in its original form Anōshag-ruwān, literally "of immortal soul"; see Justi, \textit{Namenbuch}, 17–18; Gignoux, \textit{Noms propres sassanides}, no. 102. According to Nöldeke, 136 n. 2, we do not possess any contemporary evidence for this a handsome present and gave her a noble reward. It has been said that the mother of that girl asked her about Qubādī's appearance and bodily form: The girl told her that she knew nothing about that except that she noticed that his trousers were embroidered with gold. Her mother knew thereby that he was a royal prince, and this gave her happiness.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Qubādī traveled on to Khāqān, and when he reached him, he told him that he was the son of the king of Persia and that his brother had contested the throne with him and had gained the upper hand. Hence he was now coming to Khāqān seeking help. The latter gave him fine promises, but Qubādī remained at Khāqān's court for four years, during which Khāqān kept putting off his promise to Qubādī. Qubādī became tired of waiting and sent a message to Khāqān's wife requesting her to adopt him as her own child, and requesting her to speak with her husband regarding him and ask him to fulfill his promise. She did this, and kept on at length pressing Khāqān until he dispatched an army with Qubādī.

cognomen of the future Khusraw I, hence we cannot say whether this original form of the by-name was used for him or whether a shorter form was current. De Blois has, moreover, pointed out that this epithet is commonly used in Middle Persian with the simple meaning of “deceased” (hence the equivalent of Arabic al-maḥḍūm “the one on whom [God] has had mercy”), thus strengthening the probability that it was not applied to Khusraw till after his death; see Burzoy's Voyage to India and the Origin of the Book of Kalilah wa Dimnah, 96.

333. Trousers were regarded by classical writers as a characteristic garment for the Persians [according to Herodotus, History, 1.71, adopted by the Persians from the Scythians, steppe people of Inner Asia]. A Byzantine author like Theophylactus Simocatta speaks of the “gold-embroidered trousers” of the Persian kings. Ḥamzah al-Īṣṭahānī, Ta'rikh, 50, says that Kawād's trousers were red. The Arabic word for trousers, sirwāl is of doubtful etymology, though often assumed to be a loanword from Persian [cf. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 18, 24; the parallel Persian form shalwār is often derived from a word shāl said to mean “thigh,” but an origin in a putative OP word zārawāro, as asserted by W. Björkman in his EP article “Sirwāl,” is impossible (personal communication from Professor N. Sims-Williams)].

334. According to some Western sources, when Kawād was in exile among the Hephthalites, he married the king's daughter, the offspring of the ruler and Firūzdūkht [see n. 307 above]. This would appear to be the basis for the story here in al-Ṭabarī's text, in which he becomes the adoptive son of the Khāqān's wife and, by extension, of the Khāqān himself. He would in any case now be in a strong position to secure military help from a father-in-law/adoptive father in gaining the Persian throne.
When Qubadh departed with the military force and reached the vicinity of Naysabur, he asked the man who had brought the girl to him about what had happened to her. The man made enquiries of the girl’s mother, who told him that she had given birth to a boy. Qubadh gave orders for the child to be brought to him. She came to him, bringing Anusharwan by her hand. When she entered his presence, he asked her about the boy’s history, and she informed him that he was his own son, that the boy resembled him in his bodily form and handsomeness. It is said that the news of Balash’s death reached him on that very spot. He regarded the child’s birth as a good augury, and ordered him and his mother to be conveyed in wagons of the type customary for royal womenfolk.

When Qubadh reached al-Mada’in and had gathered together firmly in his hands all the reins of royal power, he sought out Sukhrâ for special honor, delegated to him all his executive powers, and gave him thanks for the service rendered to him by his son (sc., by Zarmihr). He then sent out troops to the distant frontiers, which inflicted hurt on his enemies and brought back numerous captive women and children.

Between al-Ahwâz and Fârs he built the town of Arrajan, and likewise he built the town of Hulwân, and, in the administrative district (kurâh) of Ardashîr Khurrah, in the neighborhood of Kârazîn, a town called Qubadh Khurrhâh. All this was in addition to [other] towns and villages he founded and to [other] canals he had dug and bridges he had constructed.

335. Carts and wagons, originally with two wheels and shafts for the animals drawing them, are known to have been used by the steppe peoples of Inner Asia from early Christian times onward, hence this form of transport would be familiar to Kawadh from his residence among the Hephthalites, but they seem in any case to have been employed in Persia, on the testimony of classical authors, from Achaemenid times onward for conveying royal consorts. See also EP, s.v. ‘Araba. II. (M. Rodinson).

336. According to al-Baladhuri, Futuh, 194, Kawadh sent one of his commanders into the region of Arrân in Transcaucasia to secure the Caucasus passes against the Khazars [at this early period, this is probably anachronism, and the steppe peoples to the north of the Caucasus were probably Huns, the Turkish Onughurs, and/or Avars, since it is only ca. 630 that a distinct Khazar state begins to emerge; see P. B. Golden, Khazar Studies, I, 28ff., 58–59]. Kawadh then ordered the building in Arran of various towns and defences between Shirwan and the Alan Gates.

337. For Arrajan, see al-Tabari, I, 818, p. 12 and n. 45 above. Hulwân, at the entrance from the Iraq plain to the pass through the Zagros mountains and thence Now when the greater part of Qubadh's days had gone by, with Sūkhra in charge of the government of the kingdom and the management of affairs, the people came to Sūkhra and undertook all their dealings with him, treating Qubadh as a person of no importance and regarding his commands with contempt. At last, Qubadh became desirous of resuming power and was no longer able to endure that state of affairs or remain content with it. He wrote to Sābūr of al-Rayy, [a man] from the house called Mihrān, who was Supreme Commander of the Land (išbahbadh al-bilād), to come to him with the troops under his command. Sābūr came to him with these, and Qubadh sketched out for him the position regarding Sūkhra and gave him the necessary orders concerning this last. The next morning, Sābūr went into Qubadh's presence and found Sekhra seated there with the king. He walked toward Qubadh, passing before Sūkhra and paying no attention to him. Sūkhra [for his part] gave no heed to this part of Sābūr's cunning plan, until Ṣābūr threw round his neck a noose he had with him and then dragged him off. He was taken away, loaded with fetters, and consigned to gaol. People commented at that time, “Ṣūkhra’s wind has died away, and a wind belonging to Mihrān has now started to blow,” and this became proverbial. After that, Qubādh ordered Sūkhra to be executed, and this was done.\footnote{As Nöldeke observed, 140 n. 2, Kawād’s seeming ingratitude here may have sprung from fear of Sūkhra’s ascendency in the state and of his behavior as an overmighty subject; if so, it would accord with the information given in n. 338 above.}

When ten years had elapsed of Qubādh’s reign, the Chief Mōbadh and the great men of state agreed together on deposing Qubādh from his throne, so they did this and imprisoned him. This was because he had become a follower of a man named Mazdak and his partisans, who proclaimed, “God has established daily sustenance in the earth for His servants to divide out among themselves with equal shares, but men have oppressed each other regarding it.” They further asserted that they were going to take from the rich for the poor and give to those possessing little out of the share of those possessing much; moreover, [they asserted that] those who had an excessive amount of wealth, womenfolk, and goods had no more right to them than anyone else. The lower ranks of society took advantage of this and seized the opportunity; they rallied to Mazdak and his partisans and banded together with them. The people \(\text{al-\text{nās}, i.e., the higher levels of society}\) suffered from the activities of the Mazdakites, and these last grew strong until they would burst in on a man in his own house and appropriate his dwelling, his womenfolk, and his possessions without the owner being able to stop them. They contrived to make all these doctrines attractive to Qubādh, but also threatened him with deposition \(\text{if he did not cooperate with them}\). Very soon it came to pass that a man among them \(\text{i.e., the Mazdakites?}\) no longer knew his own son, nor a child his father, nor did a man any longer possess anything with which he could enjoy amleness of life.\footnote{No episode in Sasanid history has engendered so much discussion by modern scholars, from Nöldeke himself \(\text{in his trans., 455–67 Excursus 3 on Mazdak and the Mazdakites}\) through Christensen to recent scholars like F. Altheim and Ruth Stiehl, N. V. Pigulevskaya, O. Klima, Mansour Shaki \(\text{viewing the Mazdakite revolt as an upsurge of oppressed peasantry had obvious attractions for scholars}\).}
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

They now consigned Qubādh to a place to which only they had access and set up in his place a brother of his called Jāmāb. They told Qubādh, “You have incurred sin by what you have done in the past, and the only thing that can purify you from it is handing over your womenfolk.” They even wanted him to make writing behind the Iron Curtain), H. Gaube, and Patricia Crone, as the appearance of the Mazdakite movement and Kawād’s involvement in it. Two recent summations of the problem are Ehsan Yarshater’s chapter “Mazdakism” and, more controversially, Patricia Crone’s article “Kavād’s Heresy and Mazdak’s Revolt.” In brief, it seems unlikely that Mazdak espoused a thoroughgoing program of communism of property and wives, entailing a total upheaval in society, or that Kawād would adopt such a program in its entirety, thereby subverting the hierarchy of classes on which Persian monarchy and society had rested from time immemorial and laying a disordered land open to attacks from the Byzantines on one side and the Hephthalites on the other.

What Yarshater and Crone bring out, despite their different emphases, is that, when Mazdakism came to prominence in the first part of Kawād’s reign (488–96), at a time when the emperor was still a youth or young man, it clearly appeared as a Zoroastrian heresy. As such it stemmed from the ideas of a third century A.D. heresiarch, Zarādusht of Fasā in Fārs (the Zarādhusht, son of Khurraḵān, of al-Ṭabarī, I, 893, p. 148 below), not connected in any way with Manichaeism, and in Weltanschauung and ethos directly opposed to Mani’s asceticism and suspicion of the present world. Kawād could never have become, by definition as a Sasanid monarch, a fervid communist, but did see the utility of some of Mazdak’s ideas in his endeavors to reduce the excessive power of the nobility, to modernize the Sasanid state, to make its social structure more flexible, and to render it more able to withstand attacks from its powerful external enemies in both east and west. His proposed reform of marriage practices did not involve communism of wives, ibāḥat al-nisā’, but rather a widening of such existing practices as wife lending, a redistribution of women immured within princely and noble harems, and the allowing of women to marry outside their own class. Regarding property, some redistribution, rather than confiscation, was probably envisaged. Such policies would have reduced social distinctions and destroyed the purity of noble lineages. They must have been anathema to the Persian nobility, and only Kawād’s youth explains how he thought he could enforce such measures, given that the only coercive power at his disposal was that of an army staffed by the great nobility and dīhquāns themselves, members of the classes most likely to be directly affected by the reforms. Hence the ending of what was apparently the first phase of the Mazdakite movement with Kawād’s deposition in 496 by a conspiracy of the nobility, who replaced him by what was hoped would be a more pliant Jāmāb/Zāmāsp, is wholly explicable.

343. Nöldeke, 142 n. 1, noted that all is straightforward in the narrative up to this point, but that it now becomes illogical and absurd, with Kawād dethroned by the Mazdakites but with them influential enough once more after his restoration to procure the killing of Sūkhrā/Zarmihr. Nöldeke attributed this section to Ibn al-Muqaffā’.

Jāmāsp- is in Persian legendary history a son of Kay Khushraw. Whether this is the name appearing here as Jāmāb/Zāmāsp, Greek form Zamaspēs, on his coins over himself to them as a sacrifice, so that they could kill him and make him an offering to the fire. When Zarmihr, son of Sukhrā, perceived this, he went forth with an accompanying group of the nobles, ready to expend his own life, and then killed a great number of the Mazdakites, restored Qubād to his royal power and drove out his brother Jámasb. After this, however, the Mazdakites kept on inciting Qubād against Zarmihr to the point that Qubād killed him.³⁴⁴ Qubād was always one of the best of the Persian kings until Mazdak seduced him into reprehensible ways. As a result, the bonds linking the outlying parts of the realm became loosened and the defense of the frontiers fell into neglect.³⁴⁵

Z'M'SP, i.e., Zamasp, is unclear. See on Jámasb's coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 64, 375–76, 461–63, Plate XVII, Table XVIII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 51, Table X, Plate 11; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 137–39; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236–37. See on the name, Nöldeke, trans. 140 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 109. His brief reign, separating the two parts of Kawād's one, was 496–98. See on it, Christensen, Sassanides, 349–51; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 150.

³⁴⁴ It is strange, as pointed out by Nöldeke, trans. 140 n. 2, that after putting Sukhrā to death, Kawād should take into his service the son Zarmihr and that Zarmihr should then take a leading part in the release and restoration of Kawād after the Mazdakite ascendancy, only to be killed in his turn by the emperor. He suggested that we do not need to assume that Kawād killed successively father and son, but that we have to deal instead with one minister only, Sukhrā Zarmihr, who had been with Kawād in exile among the Hephthalites but who now, after the emperor's return, had arrogated too much power in the state to himself, leading to his elimination in the usual fashion. This event would have been split into two episodes corresponding to the two elements making up Sukhrā Zarmihr's name. The actual occasion of the execution must, on this analysis, be accordingly pushed back to the second part of Kawād's reign; but see n. 338 above.

³⁴⁵ That Kawād was a weakling who allowed his empire to fall apart as alleged here [and in al-Ṭabarī, I, 888–89, pp. 139–41 below, in regard to Kawād's relations with the Kindi chief al-Ḥāzīth b. 'Amr] could well be a slanderous report going back to the Zoroastrian priestly and Persian aristocratic tradition exemplified in the Book of Kings which Ibn al-Muqaffā' made available for later Arabic authors, and reflecting Kawād's involvement early in his reign with Mazdakite doctrines and attempts to curb the Zoroastrian clergy and the nobility [see n. 342 above and n. 349 below]. It is further reflected, for instance in the report of al-Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 292, that in Kawād's reign the irrigation channels in the district of Kaskar on the Tigris in Lower Iraq were allowed to fall into disrepair.

Nöldeke, trans. 142 n. 3, endeavored at length to refute this partisan verdict, pointing out that Kawād held the throne, with just a two or three years' break, for the lengthy period of forty-three years. During this time he undertook two protracted wars against the Greeks [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 887, p. 137 and n. 351 below].
A certain person knowledgeable about the history of the Persians has [on the other hand] mentioned that it was the great men of state of the Persians who imprisoned Qubadh when he became a partisan of Mazdak and one of the followers of his doctrines, and who raised to the royal power in his stead his brother Jāmāsb, son of Fayruz. Now a sister of Qubadh's went to the prison where he was incarcerated and tried to gain entry, but the official responsible for guarding the prison and its inmates prevented her from entering. This man became roused by the desire to ravish her at that opportunity, and told her how much he desired her; she informed him that she would not resist him in anything he might desire of her, so he let her in. She entered the prison, and spent a day with Qubadh. Then at her bidding, Qubadh was rolled up in one of the carpets in the gaol, and this was borne by one of his male attendants, a strong and hardy youth, and brought out of the prison. When the lad went past the prison commander, the latter asked him what he was carrying. He was unable to answer, but Qubadh's sister came up behind the lad and told the prison commander that it was a bed roll she had slept on during her menstrual periods and that she was only going forth to purify herself and would then return. The man believed her, and did not touch the carpet or go near it, fearing lest he become polluted by it, and he allowed the lad who was bearing Qubadh to pass freely out. So he went along with Qubadh, the sister following after him.

Procopius regarded Kawād as exceptionally clever and energetic. He also maintained a general peace with the Hephthalites in the east; see n. 348 below. Similarly, Crone, "Kawād's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 25–26, stresses that, while Kawād ruled in a mild and pacific fashion, and abstained during his pro-Mazdakite phase from meat (al-Tabarī, I, 889, p. 142 below), after his restoration he behaved in a bellicose enough manner and in his warfare with the Byzantines was as savage as any of his predecessors.

346. According to Greek sources, Kawād's fortress-prison lay in Susiana.Procopius regarded Kawād as exceptionally clever and energetic. He also maintained a general peace with the Hephthalites in the east; see n. 348 below. Similarly, Crone, "Kawād's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 25–26, stresses that, while Kawād ruled in a mild and pacific fashion, and abstained during his pro-Mazdakite phase from meat (al-Tabarī, I, 889, p. 142 below), after his restoration he behaved in a bellicose enough manner and in his warfare with the Byzantines was as savage as any of his predecessors.

346. According to Greek sources, Kawād's fortress-prison lay in Susiana. Procopius, who makes the ingenious woman here Kawād's wife and not his daughter (followed in this by Agathias, see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 128–29, 157–58), simply calls it "the fortress of oblivion" and has a lengthy digression on its past history within his already extended account of Kawād's enforced interregnum, imprisonment, and escape. See The Persian War, I.v.i–vi.19; Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 155. Theophrastes, however, calls the fortress Giligerda, which led the nineteenth-century traveler and historian Sir Henry Rawlinson to identify it with Gilgird in the mountains to the east of Shushtar. See Nöldeke, trans. 144 n. 1.
Qubadh now took to flight until he reached the land of the Hepththalites, in order to ask their king to help him and to provide him with an army, so that he might make war on those who had rebelled against him and deposed him. It has been further related that, on his outward journey to the Hepththalites, he halted at Abarshahr at the house of one of its leading citizens, who had a daughter of marriageable age, and it was on the occasion of this journey that he had sexual relations with the mother of Kisra Anūsharwān.\footnote{Abarshahr was the district around Nīshābūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 819, p. 15 and n. 59 above. Al-Yaʾqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 185–86, has Abatrshahr here, but al-Dinawari, \textit{al-Akhbār al-tiwāl}, 65–66, in a more detailed account than that of al-Ṭabarī, has Kawād fleeing for refuge in the house of a dīhqān, whose ancestry went back to Farīdūn, on the borders of Khūzistān and Iṣfahān, and Firdawsi follows al-Dinawari substantially. The emperor’s flight to a refuge in southwestern-western Persia obviously accords better with his incarceration just before this in Susiana. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. \textit{I}, 145 nn. 2–4.} It has been also related that Qubadh returned from that journey with his son Anūsharwān and the latter’s mother.\footnote{There is little information in the Arabic sources on Kawād’s stay among the Hepththalites (with whom he already had links from his time as a hostage at the Hepththalite court during his father’s reign), but useful information in Procopius and the Western sources. The fugitive Kawād was sheltered—after what must have been a lengthy journey right across Persia—by the king of the Hepththalites (whose personal name is unknown, unless Akhshunwār was still ruling). The king gave to Kawād in marriage his daughters, actually the child of the Persian princess who had been captured by the Hepththalites on the defeat of her father Fīrūz, hence Kawād’s niece; such a union would not have been regarded in Zoroastrian custom as at all incestuous. Kawād regained his throne with Hepththalite assistance, but at the price of continued dependence on them. He had to finance the Hepththalite army that placed him back on the throne, to cede territory along the Oxus to them, and to pay a tribute, in Sasanid coinage counterstamped with the Hepththalite name. This last was in fact paid for over thirty years till the opening of Khusraw Anūsharwān’s reign. See Marquart, \textit{Erānšahr}, 63–64; Christensen, \textit{Sassanides}, 349–50; Ghirshman, \textit{Les Chionites-Hephtalites}, 16–17 and Pl. II [coins] 92–93; Litvinsky, “The Hepththalite Empire,” 140.}

He defeated his brother Jāmāsb in the contest for royal power after the latter had reigned for six years.\footnote{The reign of Jāmāsb/Zāmāsp seems in reality to have been shorter than this, with Kawād resuming power—apparently without striking a blow—in 498 or 499, which would make his period of deposition, imprisonment, and exile only two or three years. The fate of Zāmāsp, now in turn deposed, is uncertain. Elias of Nisibis alone states that Kawād had him killed. More probable is the leniency toward his brother attributed to Kawād by the well-informed Agathias, that Zāmāsp renounced the throne of his own accord, preferring a life of safe obscurity, and was pardoned [confirmed in the Arabic source of al-Dinawari, \textit{al-Akhbār al-}}
Qubādh led an expedition against the land of the Romans, conquered one of their towns in al-Jazīrah called Āmid and carried off the women and children as captives. He gave orders for a town to be built in the borderland between Fārs and the land of al-Ahwāz and named it Wām Qubādh; this is the town named "tiwal, 66". The Christian Arabic Chronicle of Se'ert does, however, record a purge of the Zoroastrian priesthood by Kawād, with executions and imprisonments. See Nöldeke, trans. 145 n. 5; Christensen, Sassanides, 350-51; Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 130-31; eadem, Procopius on the Sixth Century, 155 [Procopius in his The Persian War confuses Jāmāsh with Firūz's successor Balāsh/Blasē]; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 150.

350. Āmid, classical Amida, was a key point in the fighting between the Byzantines and Sāsānids. It lay on the west bank of the upper Tigris, in what was in early Islamic times the district of Diyār Bakr in the province of Jazīrah, and is now the modern Turkish city of Diyarbakir. See PW, 1/2, col. 1833, s.v. Amīda [Baumgartner] Le Strange, Lands, 108-11; Canard, H'mandānides, 79-81; Elr, s.v. Amīda [D. Sellwood]. Al-Dinawari, al-Askhār al-tīwāl, 66, adds that Kawād also captured another town of the region, Mayyāfārīqīn (the Greek Martyropolis).

351. These are the sole details in the oriental sources on the great four years' war launched by Kawād against the Byzantines [summer 502–autumn 506] soon after his regaining the Persian throne. Kawād's pretext for opening hostilities was the emperor Anastasius's refusal to contribute to Kawād's expenses in financing the Hephthalite army, which had backed him, and in paying the ongoing tribute to the Hephthalites. The Byzantines must have had the hope that, if Kawād were unable to pay his former allies, a rupture between these two latter powers would occur. It seems that the Byzantine frontier fortresses and fortified towns had not been kept in good repair during the fifth century and, as a result, were at this time inadequate to withstand the Persians, especially as the Persians had acquired important stretches of territory in the later fourth century, above all the important bridgehead of Nişābīn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 826, p. 28, and nn. 90-91 above). Hence early successes for Kawād's army, which included Hephthalite contingents, were for Theodosiopolis (the later Erzerum) in western Armenia, this capture of Amīda/Āmid [see n. 350 above], and that of Martyropolis or Mayyāfārīqīn (the bare information recorded in al-Dinawari, al-Askhār al-tīwāl, 66, and Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 143). However, the war is fully documented in Greek and Syriac sources, such as Procopius's The Persian War, I.vii.1-I.x.19; cf. Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 155-56; Ps. Joshua the Styliote's Chronicle, trans. 37-62, 63-75. See Nöldeke, trans. 146 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 307-309; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 10-15; Christensen, Sassanides, 352; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephthalites, 92-93; Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l'Asie Centrale aux 5e et 6e siècles," 442; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 267-72; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians," 150-51; M. Whitby, "Procopius and the Development of Roman Defences in Upper Mesopotamia," 725-26; Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502-332, 73-119.

The fame of the Persian victory at Amida resonated several decades later in a verse of the Hiran poet 'Adī b. Zayd:

We struck to the ground Qubādh, the lord of all the Persians, even though they Būqūbādh,353 also called Arrajān.354 He laid out an administrative division (kurāh) and added to it rural districts (rasāṭīq) from the kurāh of Surraq and that of Rām Hurmuz.355 He then nominated his son Kisrā as his successor in the royal power, and wrote this out in a document, which he sealed with his seal ring.356 When had stirred up with their hands the glistening swords of Amid. (Diwān, 124 no. 41)

352. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. dxc, as being a crasis of *Weh-Amid-Kawād for the text's Raʾm Qūbādāh.

353. Following Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit., for the text's Barqūbādāh.

354. These two alternative names for Arrajān are somewhat dubious; the second one should be read as *Abarqūbādāh, as the consonant ductus in al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwal, 66, and Yāqūt, Buldān, i, 143, allows. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 146 n. 2.

355. Al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwal, 66-67, mentions a number of changes in administrative geography carried out by Kawād in the provinces of *Abarqūbādāh (locating this, however, in central Iraq), Biḥqūbādāh al-Awsaṭ and al-Asfal, and ʿĪṣāfān. These may have been connected with the cadastral survey of the Sawād of Iraq instituted by Kawād, accompanied by a new tax system, to be continued by his successor Khusraw Anūsharwān, which is mentioned in the Arabic sources. See Crone, “Kawād’s Heresy and Mazdak’s Revolt,” 33-34.

356. According to al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwal, 67, Kawād had several sons, out of whom Khusraw was the most favored, despite the emperor’s having certain grounds for suspicion (zinnah) regarding him. According to Procopius, Kawād’s eldest son was Kaosēs, i.e., Kāwūs (called by Theophanes Pthasouarsan in an attempt to render Pدادشخوارشāh, this being Kāwūs’s title as provincial ruler of ʿĪṣāfān), and there was another son Zamēs, i.e., Jam. But Kawād wished his third, younger son Khusraw to succeed him, since, according to Theophanes, Kāwūs had been brought up (in the first part of his father’s reign?) as a Mazdakite.

Toward the end of his reign, Kawād was in a stronger position vis-à-vis the nobility, and was able to make these succession arrangements himself rather than leave the choice and the election of his successor to the nobles and clergy, but he cannot have wished to provoke a strong reaction by nominating Kāwūs if the latter was still indeed an adherent of the Mazdakites. Procopius, The Persian War, i.x.1-18, further relates that Kawād had sought from the Byzantine emperor Justin I (518-27) that the latter should adopt Khusraw (just as, at the end of the fourth century, the emperor Arcadius had made the Sāsānīd Yazdagird I protector of his son and desired heir Theodosius II) [see n. 191 above]. No doubt Kawād had the intention of strengthening Khusraw’s claim to the succession, which might then have been backed, if necessary, by Byzantine arms, but Justin had refused. The second son Jāmāsēb (= Procopius’s Zamēs/Jam) was disqualified from succeeding to the throne through the loss of an eye. Hence when Kawād fell mortally ill in 531, he wrote out this succession document (al-Ṭabarî’s kitāb, al-Yaʾqūbī’s waṣīyyah) for Khusraw. According to the Byzantine chronicler John Malalas, he actually had him crowned. Again according to Procopius, ibid., i.xxxi.20-22, Kāwūs laid claim to the throne on his father’s death, and according to the later historian of ʿĪṣāfān Ibn ʿIslāndiyār, raised a rebellion, which failed and caused him to lose his life. See Nöldeke, trans. 147 n. 1; Christensen, Sassanides, 353-55; Frye “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 151; Crone, “Kawād’s Heresy and Mazdak’s Revolt,” 31-32.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Qubādhi died after having reigned for forty-three years, including the years of his brother Jāmāšb, Kīsrā put into execution the measures which Qubādhi had commended to him.\footnote{Kawād I's reign was 488–531, with the interlude of Jāmāšb/Zāmāsp's two or three years from 496 to 498 or 499. Concerning his possible age at death, see n. 338 above. Concerning his name on his coins, see n. 329 above. See on his coins, Paruck, Sassanian Coins, 64–65, 373–75, 376–80, 459–61, 464–70, Plates XVII–XVIII, Tables XVII, XIX, Göbl, Sassanian Numismatics, 51–52, Table X, Plate 1; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sassanian Coins, 21, 130–36; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sassanian Numismatics," 236.}

Mention of What Has Been Recorded Concerning the Events Taking Place among the Arabs in Qubādhi's Reign in His Kingdom and Involving His Governors

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muhammad, who said: Al-Hārith b. 'Amr b. Hujr b. 'Adi al-Kindi met al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir b. Imri' al-Qays b. al-Shaqiqah in battle and killed him, with al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān al-Akbar escaping from al-Hārith. Al-Hārith b. 'Amr al-Kindi then assumed power over the lands al-Nu'mān had ruled. At this point, Qubādhi, son of Fayruz, the ruler of Persia, sent a message to al-Hārith b. 'Amr, informing him that there had been formerly an agreement between him and his predecessor as king [among the Arabs] and that he would welcome a meeting with al-Hārith.\footnote{This is a repetition grosso modo of the events treated by al-Ṭabarī at I, 881–82, pp. 124–25 above, but bringing in Kawād at the end causes chronological difficulties, since Kawād only acceded to power in 488, and the events involving al-Nu'mān I's death and the succession of his son al-Mundhir I are probably to be placed in the second decade of the century, hence some seventy years earlier; see nn. 315, 319 above.}

Qubādhi was a Zindiq who did only good deeds, who abhorred shedding blood and who, in his dislike for shedding blood, treated... his enemies with leniency. In his time, heretical opinions (al-ahwā') became rife, and the people came to regard Qubādh as a weak ruler. Al-Ḥārisī b. ʿAmr al-Kindī, however, set out with a numerous and well-equipped army, until the two forces met at the bridge of al-Fayyūm. Qubādh ordered a dish of dates and extracted their stones. Then he ordered another dish and placed in it dishes in which the stones had been left. These two dishes were placed before them (sc., Qubād and al-Ḥārisī). The dish of dates with stones by al-Ḥārisī b. ʿAmr, and the one with no date stones in it was placed by Qubād. Al-Ḥārisī began to eat the dates and to spit out the stones. Qubād set about eating [everything in] the dish in front of him, and said to al-Ḥārisī, "What's the matter with you? Why aren't you eating exactly what I'm eating?" Al-Ḥārisī replied, "Among us, only camels and sheep eat date stones," and he realized that Qubād was deriding him. After this, two of them made peace on the basis that al-Ḥārisī b. ʿAmr and those he wished of his followers should bring their horses to drink from the Tigris up to their saddle girths but not pass any further beyond that point.

But when al-Ḥārisī saw Qubād's weakness, he began to covet

the Sawād, and ordered the men in his garrison posts (masālithihi) to cross the Euphrates and carry out raids into the Sawād. The 359. See on the term Zindiq, n. 118 above.

---

360. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 286, this was in central Iraq, near Hit on the Euphrates; cf. Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 350. As a bridge, it would be regarded as neutral ground, hence suitable for a meeting between the two opposing

361. According to Nöldeke, trans. 149 n. 3, citing the Talmud, this occurs as a formulaic legal expression.

362. These garrison posts must in reality have been part of the Sāsānīd defenses along the desert fringes against Arabs from the interior of the peninsula like those of Kindāh. From this point onward, al-Ṭabarī's account slides into legend, as recognized by Nöldeke, trans. 150 nn. 1–2, and Rothstein, Lahmiden, 88–89. What is, nevertheless, firmly historical is that between approximately 525 and 528 al-

Ḥārisī was indeed able to expel the Lakhmids from al-Ḥirah, having taken over parts of the Iraqi borderlands some twenty years before [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 881–82, pp.

124–25 and n. 319 above]. From 528 till his death in 531, Kawād was preoccupied with warfare with the Byzantines, with the emperor Justin I at the outset and then with the great Justinian I, this warfare being centered on Georgia and Trans-caucasia on one front and on the Upper Mesopotamian frontier on another one [see

Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 372–80; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the cries for help [of the local people] reached Qubadh when he was at al-Madā'īn, and he exclaimed: "This has occurred under the protection of their king," and he then sent a message to al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr that some robbers of the Arabs had mounted raids and that he wanted a meeting with him. When al-Ḥārith came, Qubadh said to him, "You have done something which no one before you has ever done," but al-Ḥārith replied, "I haven't done anything, and don't know anything about it; it was some Arab robbers, and I myself cannot keep a firm hand over the Arabs except by financial subsidies and regular troops." Qubadh said to him, "What do you want, then?" and he replied, "I want you to make over to me a grant of part of the Sawād so that I can get weapons ready by means of it." So Qubadh made over to him the side of the lower Euphrates bordering on the Arabs, comprising six tassūjīs. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī at that point sent a messenger to Tubba' in Yemen.

Death of Justinian, I, 79-89; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 267-71, 283-84, 287-94; Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502-32, 139-212. It seems, however, to have been a withdrawal of support from al-Mundhir III by Kawād that allowed al-Ḥārith to take over al-Ḥirah. Al-Mundhir had apparently been negotiating with the Persians' enemy, Byzantium. Hence credence should not be placed in the information retailed in some Arabic sources (e.g., Abu al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aḡānī, VIII, 63 = Aḡānī, 78-79; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 434) that Kawād tried first to impose Mazdakism on al-Mundhir but failed, whereupon al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr agreed to accept Mazdakism, and was rewarded by a grant of the former Lakhmid lands. See Christensen, Le règne du roi Kawād I et le communisme mazdakite, and (regarding the tale with skepticism), Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 63-64. In any case, Kawād had broken decisively with the Mazdakites on his restoration in 498 or 499, and it seems highly unlikely that he would make adherence to the heresy an instrument of diplomacy nearly thirty years later. Abū al-Baqā', al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah, 121, simply states that Kawād was unable to answer al-Mundhir's appeal for help because his kingdom was disturbed by the Mazdakites.

Al-Mundhir regained control of al-Ḥirah in 528. The sources all state that it was Khusraw Anūsharwān who restored him, but Khusraw did not come to the throne until 531; it thus seems that al-Mundhir had somehow regained possession of his capital and that Khusraw merely confirmed this. At all events, Lakhmid power was now firmly reestablished on the Iraq fringes, backed by the might of their traditional patrons and supporters, the Sāsānids. At some unspecified point, al-Mundhir managed to get hold of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr, who had had to retreat into the interior of northern Arabia after clashing with the Byzantines and Ghassānids on the Syrian frontiers. Al-Mundhir seized the Kindi leader's camels, killed al-Ḥārith himself, and massacred forty-eight members of the ruling house of Kindah, an event alluded to in the Diwān of al-Ḥārith's grandson Imrū' al-Qays (Diwān, ed. Muhammad Abū al-Fadl Ibrāhīm, 200, no. 37 vv. 1-2). Other traditions make al-Ḥārith's death at the hands of the Kalb. See Rothstein, Lahmiden, 89-90; Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 63-68.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

saying, "I covet strongly the kingdom of the Persians, and have already acquired six τασσούς of it. So gather your troops together and advance; for there is nothing between you and their kingdom, since the king does not eat meat and does not consider the shedding of blood lawful, for he is a Zindiq." So Tubba' assembled his troops and advanced until he encamped at al-Ḥirah. He drew near to the Euphrates, where the midges plagued him. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr ordered a canal to be dug for him as far as al-Najaf, and this was done: this is the Canal of al-Ḥirah. He encamped against there and sent his nephew Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ ("Shamir of the Wing") against Qubādī.363 He fought with Qubādī and routed him, compelling him to flee as far as al-Rayy. He then caught up with Qubādī there and killed him.364

Tubba' now sent Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ to Khurasan and his son Ḥassān to Sogdia (al-Ṣughd), telling them, "Whichever of you

363. See on Shamir Yūr'ish or Yuhar'ish, n. 314 above and n. 364 below, and al-Ṭabarī, I, 910, pp. 176–77 and n. 451 below.

364. All this is pure fantasy. As implied by al-Ṭabarī in I, 888, pp. 138–39 above, Kawād died a natural death, doubtless at an advanced age after such a long reign. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 411, criticizes al-Ṭabarī for his confusion here and lack of critical acumen, such defects of an absense of discrimination and discernment being common, he says, to all writers dealing with the ancient Arabs; Nöldeke in his translation omitted this passage on the legendary exploits of the Tubba' kings, that from I, 890 l. 4 to 892 l. 14. The only genuine feature in al-Ṭabarī's account is that the Tubba' prince Shamir Yūr'ish mentioned in al-Ṭabarī, I, n. 910, pp. 176–77 below, the first recorded Tubba' king (on this dynasty, see n. 314 above), really did exist.

For the king's name, Sh.m.r, the vocalization is of course speculative, there being no indication of vowels in the South Arabian script with the probable exception of w and y used both consonantally and vocally (see Beeston, Sabaic Grammar, 6–7). But Shamir or Shimr seem to have better claims that Shammar for the vocalization of the first component of the king's full name, despite the fact that the rather late author Nashwān b. Sa'id al-Ḥimyarī (d. 573/1178) expressly gives Shammar in his Shams al-'ulūm (see 'Azīmuddīn Ahmad, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns im Sams al-ulūm, 56–57). The choice of this latter form by such later writers as Nashwān was probably influenced by the rise of the North Arabian tribe of Shammar and their home, the Jabal Shammar, since there is no orthographic sign in the South Arabian script to indicate gemination (Beeston, ibid., 7–8). G. Ryckmans, Les noms propres sud-sémitiques, I, 210, has Ŝīmr, comparing this with Classical Arabic shīmr, "energetic, capable"; G. Lankester Harding, An Index and Concordance of Pre-Islamic Names and Inscriptions, 357, has Samir; and Robin, Supplément à la dictionnaire du Bible, s.v. Sheba 2., writes Shammir. In the line of verse (apocryphal, naturally) placed in Shamir's mouth in al-Ṭabarī, I, n. 910, p. 177 below, the wāfīr metre does require ShVmVrun or ShVmrun.
reaches China first shall become ruler over it." Each one headed a mighty army, said to be of 640,000 men. He further sent his nephew Ya'fur against the Romans; it was he who recited:

O my companion, you may well be full of wonder at Himyar, when they encamped at al-Jabiyah!365 Eighty thousand is the number of their chiefs,366 and for each group of eight men there is a chief!

Ya'fur proceeded until he reached Constantinople (al-Qusṭānṭiniyyah), whose people then gave him their obedience and promised to pay tribute, and then went on to Rome (Rūmiyyah), a journey of four months, and besieged it. The troops accompanying him suffered great hunger, were afflicted by plague, and became weakened. The Romans perceived what had hit them, so fell upon them and killed them, with not a single man escaping. Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ traveled on until he reached Samarqand.367 He besieged it but was unable to capture any part of it. When he realized that, he went round to the city guard, captured one man of it, and interrogated him about the city and its ruler. The man told him that, regarding its ruler, he was the most stupid of mankind, with no interest except in drinking and eating, but that he had a daughter and it was she who decided the affairs of the populace. Hence Shamir sent the man back to her with a present, telling him, "Inform her that I have only come from the land of the Arabs because of what I have heard about her intelligence, and in order that she might marry me and I might acquire through her a boy..."

365. This settlement in the Jawlān or Golan region south of Damascus was a main residence of the Byzantines' allies, the chiefs of the Jafnid family of Ghassān, probably their summer encampment, and it was further important in the periods of the Arab conquest of Syria and of the early Umayyads as a military encampment and concentration point for troops. See Yaqūt, Buldān, II, 91–92; Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 460–61; Nöldeke, Die Ghassānischen Fürsten, 47–49; H. Lammens, "L'événement des Marwānides et le califat de Marwān Ier," 77–79; Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 44.1 EP, s.v. Djiābiya (H. Lammens-J. Sourdil-Thomine).

366. Thus interpreting rawāyahum, pl. of rāwiyah, "a camel used for drawing water," such a camel being likened to the chief who bears the burden of blood money, to be paid in camels by his tribe. See Lane, Lexicon, 1196c; Glossarium, p. cclxxii: rāwiyah = dux.

367. Presumably to Transoxania via Khurāsān, Ḥassān having, as it later appears, preceded him to Sogdia and then China.
who will rule over both the Persians and the Arabs. [Tell her also] that I have not come seeking wealth but that I have here with me four thousand chests of gold and silver and that I will hand it over to her and proceed onward to China. If I succeed in gaining the land, she will become my wife; but if I perish, all that wealth will be hers."

When his message was brought to her, she said, "I have fallen in with his wishes, so let him send what he has mentioned." Hence he sent to her four thousand chests, with two men inside each chest. Now Samarqand had four gates, with four thousand men by each gate. He fixed as a sign of recognition between himself and them the striking of camel bells, and gave orders regarding that to the envoys he sent with them. When they got inside the city, he had the camel bells struck; they sprang out [from the chests] and seized control of the gates. Shamir led a frontal attack with his troops and entered the city, killing its populace and seizing as plunder everything within it.\(^\text{368}\) He then marched onward to China. He encountered the hosts of the Turks, put them to flight, and went on to China, but found that Ḥassān b. Tubba' had preceded him by three years. According to what certain people have mentioned, the two of them remained in China until they died, their stay there extending to twenty-one years.

He related: Those who have asserted that they both remained in China until they died have said that Tubba' built [a chain of] lighthouses (al-manār) spanning the expanse between him and them, and when any affair of moment occurred, they lit fire beacons at night, and the news was thereby conveyed in a single night. He laid down as a sign between him and them that, "If I light two fires at my end, this signifies the death of Ya'fur, and if I light three fires, that means the death of Tubba'; whereas, if a single fire is kindled at their end, it means the death of Ḥassān, and if two fires, the death of both of them." They kept to this arrangement, until he lit two fires, and that signified the death of Ya'fur, and then he lit three fires, and that signified the death of Tubba'.

\(^{368}\) A Persian popular etymology derived the city's name (presumably after its supposed rebuilding) from this legendary episode, Shamir kand "Shamir destroyed, uprooted [it]," according to Ḥamzah al-Ṭabarānī, 108.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

He related: According to the story generally agreed upon, Shamir and Hassan returned via the road they had previously taken when they had originally started out, until they came into Tubba’s presence with the wealth they had obtained in China plus various kinds of jewels, perfumes, and slave captives. Then they all went back together to their own land, Tubba’ traveled onward till he reached Mecca, where he lodged in the ravine of the cook shops (al-maṭābikh). Tubba’ died in Yemen. None of the kings of Yemen after him ever sallied forth from Yemen on raids to any other land. His reign lasted for one hundred and twenty-one years.

He related: It is said that Tubba’ had become a convert to Judaism because of the rabbis (al-ahbār), a large group of whom had gone from Yathrib to Mecca with him. He related: They say that Ka’b al-Ahbar’s lore came from the surviving material those rabbis had bequeathed; Ka’b al-Ahbar came from the Himyar.

---

369. Tubba’’s coming to Mecca and his designs against the Ka’bah are treated in more detail by al-Ṭabarî at I, 90ff., pp. 164ff. below. In giving this story, also from Ibn Ishāq, the historian of Mecca al-Azraqi specifies that al-shīb min al-maṭābikh got its name because Tubba’ set up his own kitchens in the ravine of Mecca later called that of the early Umayyad governor of the city, ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Āmir b. Kurayz (Kitāb akhīb Makkah, I, 85).

370. We certainly know of the presence of Judaism in pre-Islamic Yathrib, the Islamic Medina, notably from the story of the Prophet Muhammad’s relations with the local Jewish tribes there after he had made the hijrah from Mecca to Medina. These Jews must have emigrated from Palestine to settlements along the Wādi al-Qurā in western Arabia, Yathrib being the farthest south of these colonies; the stimulus for this migration may well have been the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 or the aftermath of Bar Kokhba’s revolt. i.e., after A.D. 135. The term used for “rabbī” in early Arabic, habr/bībr, given the Arabic broken plural aḥbār, stems directly from Hebrew habēr, and was already known in pre-Islamic Arabia. See C. C. Torrey, The Jewish Foundation of Islam, 34; A. Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur’ān, 49–50. Al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-ʿulāmī, 35, equates al-ḥabr with the Muslim al-ʾālim.

How the town which became the Islamic Medina/al-Madinah had acquired its earlier name of Yathrib (still appearing in Qur’ān, XXXIII, 13) is uncertain, but the name is undoubtedly ancient. A cuneiform inscription from Harrān mentions ya-at-rī-bu as one of the towns in Arabia to which Nabû-nā’a'id or Nabonidus of Babylon (r. 556–539 B.C.) penetrated; in the Greek geographer Ptolemy we have Isthrippa; and in Minaean inscriptions we find Yirb. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 201 n. 1; F. Rosenthal, introd. to Torrey, The Jewish Foundation of Islam, repr. p. 21; E3, s.v. al-Madina. i. History to 1926 (W. M. Watt).

371. Abū Ishāq Ka’b al-Aḥbār (“Ka’b of the rabbis”) was a Yemeni convert from Judaism to Islam, probably in 17/638 (thus in al-Ṭabarî, I, 2514), dying in 32/652–
As for Ibn Ishaq’s account, he has mentioned that the member of the Tubba’ dynasty who went to the Orient was Tubba’ the Second (al-akhir), namely, Tubba` Tuban As‘ad Abū Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. ‘Amr Dhi al-Adh‘ār, who was the father of Ḥassān. Ibn Ḥumayd transmitted that information to us, saying that he had it from Salamah.

Then there assumed the royal power Kisra Anusharwan, son of Qubādh, son of Fayruz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahram (V) Jūr. When he became king, he wrote letters to the four Fadhusbans, each of whom was governor over a region of the land of Persia, and to their subordinate officials. The text of his letter to the Fadhusban of Azerbaijan is as follows:

[Kisra I Anūsharwān]

Because the two prolonged reigns of Khusraw I Anusharwan (531-79) and Khusraw II Abarwez (590 and 591-628) made them especially well known to the Arabs, and because those monarchs’ actions impinged very much on the history of the pre-Islamic Arabs and the beginnings of Islam, the assumption arose among the Arabs that Kisra was a generic term for all the Persian kings, and it actually acquired a broken plural, al-Aksārān. See Noldeke, “Iranian National History,” 375–76. Because the two prolonged reigns of Khusraw I Anusharwan (531–79) and Khusraw II Abarwez (590 and 591–628) made them especially well known to the Arabs, and because those monarchs’ actions impinged very much on the history of the pre-Islamic Arabs and the beginnings of Islam, the assumption arose among the Arabs that Kisra was a generic term for all the Persian kings, and it actually acquired a broken plural, al-Aksārān. See Noldeke, trans. 151 n. 1. For the component Anusharwān, see n. 332 above.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from the King Kisra, son of Qubadh, to Wari, son of the Nakhirjan, Fadhushban of Azerbaijan and Armenia and their territories, and Dunbawand and Tabaristan and their adjacent territories and his subordinate officials, greetings! The thing that most strikes fear into the hearts of people is the feeling of deprivation felt by those who fear the ending of their state of comfortable living, the eruption of civil disorders, and the advent of unpleasant things to the best of individuals, one after the other of such individuals, in regard to their own persons, their retainers, their personal wealth, or what is dearest to them. We know of no cause for fear or absence of a thing that brings more crushing ill-fortune for the generality of people, nor one likely to bring about universal disaster, than the absence of a righteous king.

376. It is hardly conceivable that the Sasanids should have used the exact form of the Islamic basmalah; whether they used a corresponding formula at the opening of their chancery documents, etc., is unknown, although Mr F. C. de Blois points out that extant Pahlavi texts (known, of course, in Islamic-period manuscripts) often begin with the formula pad ndm yazaddn "by the name of the gods," or words to the same effect. He cites Saul Shaked, "Some Iranian Themes in Islamic Literature," 152–54, who is skeptical, however, that there was any Persian influence on Islam in this regard.

377. This appears both as a family name and as a title, but was perhaps originally a patronymic. In al-Baladhi, Futuh, 262, we have this same form, al-Nakhirjan, as the name or title of the defender of al-Madain against the Arabs of 'Umar's army. See Noldeke, trans. 152 n. 2. N. a of Noldeke's text suggests the possible reading Zadhuyah for the son of the Nakhirjan, which would make more sense than the unusual Wari.

378. These would be the territories making up the "northern quarter" of the realm, the arrangements made by Khusraw Anusharwan being variously defined in an Armenian source and in the later Islamic historians and geographers: see n. 385 below.

379. As Noldeke remarks, trans. 153 n. 2, the sententious and moralizing tone of the document (this being merely its introduction) is not untypical of what we know of Sasanid chancery documents.
When Kisra had gained firm control of power, he took measures to extirpate the religious beliefs of a hypocritical person from the people of Fasa, called Zaradhusht, son of Khurrakan, a new faith which he had brought into existence within the Mazdaean religion. A considerable number of people followed him in that heretical innovation, and his movement became prominent on account of this. Among those who carried out missionary work for him among the masses was a certain man from M.dh.riyyah (?) called Mazdaq, son of Bamdadh. Among the things he ordained for people, made attractive to them, and urged them to adopt, was holding their possessions and their families in common. He proclaimed that all this was part of the piety that is pleasing to God, and that He will reward with the most handsome of recompenses, and that, if that religious faith he commanded them to observe and urged them to adopt were not to exist, the truly good way of behavior, the one which is pleasing to God, would lie in the common sharing or property. With those doctrines, he incited the lower classes against the upper classes. Through him, all sorts of vile persons became mixed up with the best elements of society, criminals seeking to despoil them of their possessions found easy ways to do this, tyrannical persons had their paths to tyranny facilitated, and fornicators were able to indulge their lusts and get their hands on high-born women to whom they would never have been able to aspire. Universal calamity overwhelmed the people to an extent they had never before experienced.

380. Fasa was an important town and district of southeastern Fars. See Yaqut, Buldân, IV, 260–61; Le Strange, Lands, 290; Schwarz, 97–100; Barthold, Historical Geography, 152–53; EP, s.v. Fasa (L. Lockhart). That Zaradhusht came from Fasa is stated in the Denkard. See Nöldeke, trans. 456; Crowe, "Kavad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 24.

381. The sources variously attribute Mazdak to this mysterious M.dh.riyya (which Nöldeke, trans. 154 n. 3, compared with Manâdhir in Susiana and which Christensen, Le règne du roi Kawâd Ier, 100, sought to interpret as Mâdhârayya in Lower Iraq), to Ištâkhr in Fars [al-Dinawarî, al-Akhbâr al-tiwâl, 65], and to Nasâ in Khurasân [al-Birûnî, al-Āthâr al-bâqiyyah, 209]. See Nöldeke, trans. 457 and n. 3; Crowe, "Kawad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 24.

382. The question of whether there were two Mazdakite revolts, one toward the end of Kawad's reign and another one at Khusrâw's accession or shortly after it, and the exact timing of the revolt(s) anyway, has been much discussed. Most recently, Crowe has suggested that it is simplest to assume that a single revolt broke out on Khusrâw's accession in 531, at a time when he was combating the rival succession
Hence Kisra forbade the people\footnote{The syntax here is somewhat unusual in that we have verb-object-subject instead of the normal verb-subject-object, but one only derives sense if Kisra is taken as the subject and al-nas as the object, as here and as in Nölke's translation, "Da verbot nun Chosrau ...".} to act in accordance with any of the heretical innovations of Zaradosht, son of Kharrakan, and Mazdaq, son of Bamdadh. He extirpated all their heresy, and he killed a great number of their fervid adherents and did not allow himself to be deflected from any of what he had forbidden the people. [He further killed] a group of the Manichaeans, and made firm for the Magians the religion they had always held.

Before Kisra became king, the office of Isbahbadh—that is, the supreme commander of the armed forces—was held by one man, who was responsible for this supreme command over all the land.\footnote{This is the i$bahbadh al-bilad/Erän-spahbed of al-Tabari, I, 885, p. 131 above.} Kisra now divided this office and rank between four Isbahbadhs, namely, the Isbahbadh of the East, comprising Khurasan and its adjoining regions; the Isbahbadh of the West; the Isbahbadh of Nimruz, that is, the land of Yemen; and the Isbahbadh of Azerbaijan and its adjoining regions, that is, the Khazar lands.\footnote{The division of the realm into four quarters (probably in MP, kustag; Arabic, rub', nāhiya), described by their geographical orientation, is attested to in the Armenian geography ascribed to Moses Khorenac'i, which considers the various places in the Persian lands according to a division of (1) K'usti Khorbaran, the West; (2) K'usti Nemroy, the midday region, the South; (3) K'usti Khorasan, the East; and K'usti Kapkoh, the direction of the Caucasus, the North. See Marquart, Eransenhr, 16-17, and for the exact delimitation in this work of the Quarter of the South, see n. 969 below. The Islamic sources have similar information about these divisions. Thus Ibn Khurradadhbih, Kitâb al-masâlik wa-al-mamâlik, 118: Jibâl and its components, Rayy, Azerbaijan, Tabaristan, Dunbâwând, and Qûmis; al-Ya'qubi, Ta'rikh, I, 201-202: Tabaristan, Rayy, Jibâl, and its components, and Azerbaijan; al-Dinawârî, al-Akbâr al-tiwâl, 67: Isfahân, Qum, Jibâl, Azerbaijan and Armenia. See Nöldeke, trans. 155 n. 4; and the discussion in Marquart, Eransenhr, 94-95. The Khazar lands were never, of course, controled by the Sasanids (or any other rulers of Persia), and the mention of this Turkish people in a context as early claims of his elder brother Kâwûs and military control over the realm was obviously relaxed. Khusraw may have bought time by offering the Makdakites some degree of toleration, and he certainly brought the protracted, but by now rather desultory war with Justinian to an end. Once firmly in command of affairs, lammad ista$hkama lahu al-mulk, as al-Tabari, I, 893, puts it, he turned on the Mazdakites, massacred them and gradually restored order in the land. A terminus ad quem for this would be 540, when Khusraw resumed the war with Byzantium. See Crane, 30-33.} He... saw in this new arrangement a way of improving the good ordering of his kingdom. He strengthened the fighting quality of the soldiers with weapons and mounts. He recovered lands belonging to the kingdom of Persia, some of which had slipped out of the hand of King Qubadh and into the control of other monarchs of the nations, through various causes and reasons, including Sind, Bust, al-Rukkhkhaj, Zabulistan, Ṭukhāristān, Dardistan, and Kabulistan. He inflicted extensive slaughter among a people called the Bāriz, transported the remaining ones of them from their land, and resettled them in various places of his kingdom. They submitted to him as his servants, and he utilized them in his military campaigns. He gave orders for another people, called the Šul, to be made captives, and they were brought before him.

as the first part of the sixth century is an anachronism anyway; see further n. 390 below.

386. For Khusraw’s military reforms, see al-Ṭabari, I, 963–65, pp. 262–63, and n. 633 below.
387. Bust, al-Rukkhkhaj [classical Arachosia], Zabulistan, Kābulistan, and Dardistan [the pre-Islamic region of Gandhara, this name properly read in Nöldeke’s text, whereas in his translation, 156, he had read it, with justifiable doubt, as “Dihistān”] were all in the southeastern or eastern part of what is now Afghanistan, while Ṭukhāristān [older Bactria] was in its northern part. It is possible that the success in the mid-560s of the Western Turks against the Hephthalites north of the Oxus, with the resultant fragmentation of the northern Hephthalite kingdom, enabled the Persian king to extend Sāsānīd control toward the Oxus and into Bactria [cf. al-Ṭabari, I, 899, p. 160 below]. But Marquart, in his Erānsahr, 32–33, was dubious that Persian armies ever penetrated south of the Hindu Kush into eastern Afghanistan at this time, where the southern Hephthalite kingdom was to persist for a considerable time further, and hardly credible that they should have reached Sind. Later, however, in his “Das Reich Zābul und der Gott Zūn vom 6.–9. Jahrhundert,” 257 n. 2, he apparently accepted that Khusraw did actually conquer the Hephthalite lands south of the Hindu Kush as far as the borders of India. See Nöldeke, trans. 156 n. 1; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 94; Widengren, “Xosrau Anōšuvān, les Hephtalites et les peuples turcs,” 69–74 [a penetrating critique of the information in the various sources and the traditions they represent]; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 156. For the regions mentioned above, see EIP, s.vv. Bust [J. Sourdel-Thomine], Dardistan [A. S. Bazmee Ansari], Kābulistan [C. E. Bosworth], al-Rukkhkhaji [idem], Zabulistan [idem, forthcoming].

388. The mountain people of the Jabal Bāriz in the southeastern part of Kirmān province seem to have supplied infantry for the Achaemenid armies, and were always regarded as a bellicose and predatory race. In early Islamic times, various of the ruling dynasties of Persia launched punitive expeditions against these Kūfīchīs. See Bosworth, “The Kūfīchīs or Quṣ in Persian History,” 9–17; EIP Suppl., s.v. Bāriz, Djabal [idem].
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

He commanded that they should be killed, except for eighty of their boldest warriors, whom he spared and had settled at Shahrām Fayrūz, where he could call upon them for his military campaigns.389 There was also a people called the Abkhaz, and other ones of the B.n.j.r, Balanjar, and al-Lān, who came together in a coalition to raid his lands.390 They made an incursion into Armenia in order to raid and despoil its people. Their route thither was at that moment easy and unimpeded, and Kīsrā closed his eyes to their activities until, when they had firmly established themselves in his territories, he dispatched against them contingents of troops, who fought with them, and exterminated them apart for ten thousand of them, whom they took prisoner and then settled in Azerbaijan and the neighboring regions.391

389. For the Sūl and Shahrām Fayrūz, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 above.

390. The Abkhāz were, and still are, a people living on the eastern shores of the Black Sea to the northwest of Georgia and on the southern slopes of the northwestern prolongation of the Caucasus range; under Soviet Russian rule there was an Abkhazian ASSR within the Georgian SSR, now part of the independent Georgian Republic. The lands of the Abkhāz were invaded by the Byzantine armies of Justinian and the people converted to Christianity; subsequently, their history was closely linked with the other Christian peoples of the Georgians and Alans. See Marquart, Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge, 175–78; EP, s.v. Abkhāz (W. Barthold-V. Minorsky). However, Marquart read al-Ṭabarī’s Abkhaζ as al-Khazar, without any discussion of the questions involved. If this were correct, it would be an early mention of the appearance of this Turkish people in the steppes north of the Caucasus, cf. D. M. Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 23.

But whether it is possible to speak of the Khazars, in what was at this time their prehistory, as a separate Turkish people or just part of the Inner Asian Türk empire, is impossible to decide. See Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 335–36; P. B. Golden, Khazar Studies, I, 49–50.

The Alans originally lived north of the Caucasus, but as a result of pressure from the Huns, were pushed into the central Caucasus. At the time of Khusraw Anūsharwān they must have been still pagan, and were not converted to Christianity till the early tenth century. Their modern descendants are the Ossetians. See Marquart, Eränsahr, 65, 95, 105–06; idem, Streifzüge, 164–72; EP, s.v. Alān (Barthold-Minorsky), Marquart, op. cit., 16, also in Addenda et emendanda, p. dxci, took B.n.j.r for Bulghār, adducing the Pahlavi form Burgar for this Turkish people of the middle Volga basin and South Russian steppe; see EP, s.v. Bulghār (I. Hrbek). The Balanjar are here a people, but subsequently they gave their name to what became a well-known city of the Turkish Khazars, in eastern Caucasus to the north of Darband or Bāb al-Abwāb. See Nöldeke, 157 n. 3; Marquart, op. cit., 16–18; EP, s.v. Balandjar (D. M. Dunlop).

391. On this Caucasian campaign of Khusraw, see Christensen, Sassanides, 369–70; Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l’Asie
King Fayruz had previously erected in the regions of the Šūl and al-Lān buildings of stone, with the intention of strengthening his lands against the encroachments there of those nations. Moreover, King Qubād, son of Fayruz, had begun the construction, after his father, of a great number of building works in those regions, until, when Kisrā achieved the royal power, he gave orders for the construction in the region of the Šūl, with stone hewn in the vicinity of Jurjān, of towns, castles, fortified mounds, and many other buildings, which would serve as a protection for the people of his lands, where they might seek refuge from the enemy in the event of a sudden attack.392

The Khāqān Sinjībū was the most implacable, the most courageous, the most powerful, and the most plentifully endowed with troops of all the Turks. It was he who attacked W.r.z (?!) the king of the Hephthalites, showing no fear of the numerousness or the fierce fighting qualities of the Hephthalites, and then killed their king W.r.z and the greater part of his troops, seizing their possessions as plunder and occupying their lands, with the exception of the part of them that Kisrā had conquered.393 Khāqān won 392. See al-Tabari, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 above.

393. The episode briefly noted here reflects the fact that the Hephthalites were at this time squeezed between the growing might of the Sāsānids under Khusrav Anūsharvān and that of the Western Turks of Ishtemi or Istemi [see n. 394 below] and, subsequently, his son Tardu [Qaghan by 576]. In the years from 560 to 563 the Qaghan of the Western Turks invaded Transoxania, seized Chāch [the later Tashkent] and defeated the Hephthalites near Bukhārā. The Hephthalite state in Transoxania thus came to an end, although minor Hephthalite principalities continued in Sogdia and the upper Oxus lands, with the main focus of the surviving Hephthalite power now in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan south of the Paropamisus mountains and the Hindu Kush, and in northwestern India. As a share of the spoils from operations contemporary with those of the Turks, Khusrav now received Bactria, but was to lose it to the Turks shortly afterward.

The name W.r.z [text, W.z.r] is probably to be connected with the Avestan name Varāz-, Middle Persian Varāz, Warāzān, frequent also in compound names in both Persian and Armenian, and meaning “boar, wild boar,” especially as Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephthalites, 22–23, records an undated Hephthalite coin mentioning VRZ; whether this coin was issued by the W.r.z mentioned here is impossible to tell. See on the name Nöldeke, trans. 240 n. 1; Justi, Namenbuch, 348–59; Mayrhofer, Die aliranischen Namen, no. 355; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, nos. 940–44; Widengren, “Xosrau Anūshūrvān, les Hephthalites et les peuples turcs,” 93 n. 4; and for the compound name Shahbarāz/Shahrwarāz, n. 749 below. Among the titles of the petty princes of Khurāsān at the time of the Arab over the Abkhaz, the B.n.j.r and the Balanjar to his side, and they vouchsafed him their obedience. They informed him that the kings of Persia had always sought to ward them off by paying tribute, thereby securing safety from their raids on their (sc., the Persians') lands. Khāqān now advanced with 110,000 warriors until he reached the fringes of the land of the Šūl. He sent a message to Kisrā, uttering threats and using peremptory language against him, to the effect that Kisrā must send to him treasure and to the Abkhaz, the B.n.j.r, and the Balanjar the tribute money the Persian kings had customarily paid before Kisrā came to power. [He further threatened] that, if Kisrā did not expedite the forwarding of all that he asked, he would enter his land and attack it. Kisrā paid no heed to his menaces and did not offer Khāqān a single item of what he had demanded, since he had strongly fortified the region of the gates of the Šūl and had blocked the ways and the tracks through defiles that the Khāqān Sinjibū would have to follow in order to reach him. He also knew the strength of his defensive forces in the frontier region of Armenia: five thousand warriors, cavalrymen, and infantry. The Khāqān Sinjibū got word of Kisrā's fortifying of the frontier regions of the Šūl, hence returned to his own land with all his troops and with his intentions frustrated. Those of the enemy who were massed against Jurjān were likewise, because of the fortifications Kisrā had built in its neighborhood, unable to mount any raids on it and to conquer it.394

394. Sinjibū is to be identified with the Turkish ruler mentioned by such Byzantine historians as Menander Protector (on whom see Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, I, 422-26) in their accounts of the diplomatic and commercial exchanges between the Greeks and the Western Turks from 563 onward as Sizaboulos, Silziboulos, etc. The reigning Western Turkish Qaghan at this time was Ishtemi or Iatemi, the Ištmi or Šıtmi of the Orkhon inscriptions and the Stembschagan of Greek sources. Marquart, Eränšahr, 216-17, identified him with Silziboulos, but this is linguistically difficult, and it is more likely that Silziboulos/Sinjibū, and his son Turkhath, mentioned by Menander, were lesser Turkish rulers in the southern Transoxanian part of the extensive Türk empire. It has not so far been possible to recover the (presumably) Turkish original form of Silziboulos/Sinjibū; it seems to be rendered in the Chinese annals as Šē-li čao-wu. Marquart's analysis of the first
The people had recognized Kisrā Anūsharwān’s excellent judgment, knowledge, intelligence, bravery, and resolution, combined with his mildness and clemency toward them. When he was crowned, the great men of state and the nobles came into his presence, and with all their might and eloquence called down element Sīlz- as connected with the Sīr, the Seres of the Byzantine historian Jordanes, who located this people as living east of the Caspian Sea, and whose name seems to be enshrined in that of the Syr Darya river, is convincing, but his equation of the second element with Yabghu, the Turkish title of the leader holding the rank just below that of the Qaghan [Erānšahr, loc. cit. and 247], is less so. This war between Khusraw and the Turks—who, after the defeat of the Hephthalites (see above), must have become uneasy neighbors in the Oxus region—is to be placed in the late 560s. See Nöldeke, trans. 158 n. 2, 159 n. 1; Grousset, The Empire of the Steppes, 82–83; Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 275–76, 291; H. W. Haussig, “Die Quellen über die zentralasiatische Herkunft der europäischen Awaren,” 31–32; Sinor, “The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire,” 302–305; Sinor, “The Türk Empire. 1. The First Türk Empire (553–682),” 332–33.

The Khāqān’s advance to “the fringes of the land of Șūl” (here, then, Arabic al-Șūl would correspond to the Armenian name for Darband, Čor) is taken by Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 24–25, as relating to Bāb al-Abwāb (the bābah “gates” being the mouths of the river valleys running down from the mountains to the sea) or Darband, which commanded a particularly constricted point on the narrow route between the western Caspian shore and the easternmost spurs of the Caucasus. This would imply that the Western Turks were already operating in the South Russian steppes and the Kuban steppes north of the Caucasus, in the latter region perhaps through the agency of the tribal chief of the Khazars (if, again, as in al-Tabarī, I, 895, p. 151 above, one reads al-Khazar for Abkhaz). To Khusraw Anūsharwān is traditionally ascribed the building of the famous Wall of Darband, said to have been seven farsakhs long, to keep out the northern barbarians as part of his general plan of fortifying the Caucasus region and thereby protecting Caucasian Albania or Arrān and also Azerbaijan (impressive remains of fortifications are in fact still visible at Darband). However, many romantic and legendary elements were subsequently added to the story, e.g., in al-Baladhuri, Futuḥ, 195–96; Qudāmah b. Jaʿfar, Kitāb al-kharāj, 259–61; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 304, s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb. See Minorsky, A History of Shavān and Darband, 14, 86–88, 144; Dunlop, op. cit., 24–26; El1, s.v. Derbend [W. Barthold], El2, s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb [D. M. Dunlop].

395. Nöldeke, trans. 160 n. 2, notes that a new report on Khusraw’s reign begins here, one which stems, on the basis of parallel reports in other sources, both Christian and Muslim, from Ibn al-Muqaṭṭa’.

The image of Khusraw as a just, beneficent monarch, solicitous for the interests of rich and poor alike, while vigorous and powerful enough to defend the borders of his realm against the Greeks in the west and the Hephthalites and Turks in the east, and to extend Persian authority into lands as distant as Yemen, all contributed to the picture of an ideal ruler. Already, the Prophet Muḥammad is said to have praised him as a just king, although the prevalent Islamic image of the Kisrās, meaning the Sāsānid kings in general, came to be one of regarding them as examples of supreme royal pride and pomp. Nevertheless, for Khusraw Anūsharwān blessings on his head. When they had concluded their speeches, he stood up and delivered an oration. He began by mentioning God’s favors on His people when He had created them, and his own dependency on God for regulating their affairs and the provision of foodstuffs and the means of life for them. He left nothing [which ought to have been said] out of his oration. Then he told the people what they had suffered [through the spreading of Mazdak’s teachings]; namely, the loss of their possessions, the destruction of their religion and the damage to their position regarding their children and their means of life. He further informed them that he was looking into ways and means of putting all that right and rendering affairs strong again, and urged the people to aid him in this.

Next, he ordered the heads of the leaders of the Mazdakites to be chopped off and their possessions to be shared out among the poor and needy. He killed a large number of those people who had specifically, the image of him in the Islamic sources was in general positive, as can be discerned from anecdotes about him in adab works like the Kitāb al-tāj and the Kitāb al-mahāsin wa l-aḍḍād of Ps.-al-Jāḥiz, and the Marzubān-nāmah of Sa’d al-Din Warāmīnī, as also in the “Mirrors for Princes” such as Kay Kawūs b. Iskandar’s Qābūs-nāmah and Niẓām al-Mulk’s Siyāsāt-nāmah; often, he is linked with his supremely wise (semilegendary) vizier Buzurgmihr.

Even if there is truth in this picture—and certainly, the Sāsānid empire reached its apogee during his reign—it did not prevent Khusraw from being also a skillful exponent of Realpolitik, ready to use violence and terror to achieve his aims, and some of the later anecdotes about him stress his cunning and duplicity in dealing with opponents. The Christians of Persia had to endure some bouts of persecution during his time [although nothing as severe as that under Shābūr II], usually linked with resumption of Byzantine-Persian warfare. The Catholicos Mar Aba, a former Zoroastrian, survived imprisonment in Azerbaijan but died of the hardships he had suffered after Khusraw released him in 552. Clearly, the emperor must always have been careful to retain the support of the Zoroastrian priesthood. Yet, to be set against a natural feeling on the part of the Sāsānid authorities that Persian Christians must inevitably have a prime loyalty, through religion, to their co-religionists in the west, many of the Persian Christians seem, in fact, to have felt a strong attachment to their native land, Persia, and their own ethnos as Persians, and this counterbalanced any feelings of religious solidarity with the Greeks, especially as Byzantium stood for Chalcedonian orthodoxy as against the dominant Nestorianism and, to a lesser extent, Monophysitism, in the Persia empire. At least one high commander in the Persian army is known to have been a Christian. See for a detailed consideration of these attitudes, and the tensions between ethnos and faith which must often have been at work within the Persian Christian community, Asmussen, “Christians in Iran,” 933–35, and Brock, “Christians in the Sasanian Empire,” 10–17.

At all events, there was, on the whole, during Khusraw’s reign, some amelioration of the Christians’ lot. According to John of Ephesus, the king allowed the Monophysites to organize themselves within the realm and to choose a Catholicos.
confiscated other people’s possessions, and restored these possess-sions to their original owners. He commanded that every child concerning whom there was dispute before him about his or her origin should be attributed to that person in whose family the child was, when the real father was not known, and that the child should be given a [legal] share in the estate of the man to whom the child was now attributed, provided that the latter acknowledged the child. In regard to every woman who had been forced to give herself unwillingly to a man, that man was to be held to account and compelled to pay the bride price to her so that her family was thereby satisfied. Then the woman was to be given the choice between remaining with him or marrying someone else, except that if she had an original husband, she was to be restored to him. He further commanded that every man who had caused harm to another person in regard to his possessions, or who had committed an act of oppression against another person, should make full restitution and then be punished in a manner appropritate to the enormity of his offense. He decreed that, where those responsible for the upbringing of the children of leading families had died, he himself would be responsible for them. He married the girls among them to their social equals and provided them with their bridal outfit and necessities out of the state treasury; and he gave the youths in marriage to wives from noble families, of their own. The peace treaty of 561 with Justinian promised freedom of worship for Christians in Persia, and for Zoroastrians in the Byzantine lands, provided that there was no proselytism between the two faiths (but the inference is that apostasy from Zoroastrianism had been tolerated till then). A certain amount of intellectual freedom and a spirit of enquiry seem to have characterized Khusrav’s court, and this was an innovation among the Sasanids. Some sources attribute to the emperor himself an interest in philosophical ideas and in the tenets of other faiths. There was indeed a movement for the translation of scientific, medical, and other works from languages like Greek and Sanskrit into Middle Persian. Translations from Sanskrit are especially attributed to the monarch’s physician Burzöy. See Nöldeke, trans. 160 n. 3; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l’empire perse, 177–90; Christensen, Sassanides, 372–73, 374–440; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 161–62; Asmussen, “Christians in Iran,” 946; Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 216–19; EP², s.v. Kisrā (M. J. Morony), and Tardjama. 2. Translations from Greek and Syriac [D. Gutas], 3. Translations from Middle Persian [Pahlawi] [F. C. de Blois].

396. According to Nöldeke, trans. 163 n. 1, other, later sources state that he merely banished the leaders of the Mazdakites from his land. And among these sources, Eutychius says that the confiscated goods and property were made into a charitable foundation for the common benefit.
presented them with money for dowries, awarded them sufficient riches, and ordained that they should be members of his court so that he might call upon them for filling various of his state offices. He gave the wives of his [dead] father the choice between staying with his own wives and sharing in their maintenance and provision, and enjoying the same income as these last, or alternatively, he would seek out for them husbands of the same social standing as themselves.397

He further ordained the digging of canals and the excavation of subterranean irrigation conduits \( [\text{al-quni}] \), and provision of loans for the owners of agricultural lands and support for them. He likewise ordered the rebuilding of every wooden bridge or bridge of boats \( [\text{jisr}] \) that had been destroyed and of every masonry bridge \( [\text{qantarah}] \) that had been smashed, and further ordered that every village that had fallen into ruin should be restored to a better state of prosperity than previously. He made enquiries about the cavalrymen of the army \( [\text{al-asawi}] \), and those lacking in in resources he brought up to standard by allocating to them horses and equipment, and earmarked for them adequate financial allowances. He assigned overseers for the fire temples and provided good roads for the people. Along the highways he built castles and towers. He selected \( [\text{good}] \) administrators, tax officials, and governors, and gave the persons appointed to these functions stringent orders. He set himself to peruse the conduct, the writings, and the legal decisions of Ardashir, and took them as a model to imitate, urging the people to do likewise.

Once he had a firm grip on the royal power and all the lands were under his control, and some years after he had been reigning, he marched against Antioch, where were stationed leading commanders of Qaysar's army, and conquered it. He then gave orders that a plan should be made for him of the city of Antioch exactly to scale (literally, "according to its extent"), with the number of its houses, streets, and everything contained in it, and orders that a \( [\text{new city}] \) should be built for him exactly like Antioch but situated at the side of al-Madā'in. The city known as al-Rūmiyyah was built exactly on the plan of Antioch. He thereupon had the inhabitants of Antioch transported and settled in the new city; when

397. That is, the state of widowhood was, according to Persian custom, to be avoided as far as possible.
they entered the city’s gate, the denizens of each house went to the new house so exactly resembling their former one in Antioch that it was as if they had never left the city.398 Kisra now attacked the town of Heraclea and conquered it, followed by Alexandria and the lands extending up to it. He left behind a detachment of

398. The attack on Antioch was part of the resumed war of 540–43. Khusraw had made peace with the Byzantines in 532, just after his accession, thus ending the war that had begun toward the end of Kawād’s reign (see n. 362 above): the Persians had evacuated several fortresses in Lazica and the Byzantines had agreed to pay a very substantial annual tribute in return for “eternal peace,” since the empire was being hard pressed by external enemies in the West; see Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502–532, 213–24. The resumption of war resulted from a general Byzantine resentment at the inferior position which the paying of tribute implied, and from the sheer inability to keep up these payments at a time when the empire was being threatened on so many fronts, with military defense expenditure causing a disastrous drain on the Byzantine treasury. A considerable effort had been made in the early years of Justinian’s reign (527–32) to continue the earlier work of Anastasius. Thus he improved Daras/Dārā or Anastasiopolis, founded by Anastasius in 505 at a strategic point some 25 km/15 miles southeast of Mārdīn and facing the Persian bastion of Niṣibin, which lay further to its southeast [see on it Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 424; Le Strange, Lands, 96–97; Elr, s.v. Dārā (M. Weiskopf); Whitby, “Procopius’ Description of Dara” (Buildings II, 1–3), 737–83, who describes and elucidates those of its buildings and defensive walls still visible], making it the single most important point in the Byzantine defensive system in Upper Mesopotamia. Justinian also strengthened the forward fortified points at such places as Circesium, Martyropolis, and Theodosiopolis. However, the “eternal peace” may have involved some restrictions on Byzantine frontier construction, and the emperor had in any case become involved in the defense of his western provinces. Hence when Khusraw marched against Antioch through the more weakly defended, more southerly middle Euphrates region, he found a city with deficiencies in its defenses, in part because of an earthquake some years previously. In June 540 he sacked it, a disastrous setback for the Greeks, in the course of which the overstretched Byzantine army was revealed as lacking the manpower really to protect this and other cities of northern Mesopotamia and northern Syria until troop reinforcements could be brought up from further west and the military position in Mesopotamia stabilized. See Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 163–65; Whitby, “Procopius and the Development of Roman Defenses in Upper Mesopotamia,” 726–29.

Meanwhile, Justinian had to agree to a truce on the basis of the Greeks paying an indemnity and arrears of tribute. The new city for the dispossessed citizens of Antioch on the Orontes was called by the Persian emperor Weh Andiyog Khoršōr, “Khusraw [has built this] better than Antioch,” and was popularly known by the Persians as Rūmāğān “town of the Greeks” = al-Rūmiyyah; it formed part of the urban complex of al-Madā’in. See Nöldeke, trans., 165 nn. 2–4; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 420–27; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 91–113; Christensen, Sassanides, 386–87; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 486–92; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 154–55; Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 209–36.
his troops in the land of the Romans after Qayşar had submitted to him and had paid him ransom money.399

He returned home from Rûm and then took the field against the Khazars, and sought revenge on them for the damage they had wrought on him by afflicting his subjects.400 Next, he turned his attention to Aden. He blocked up part of the sea there which lay between two mountains and is adjacent to the land of Abyssinia (al-Ḥabashah), with large ships, rocks, iron columns, and chains, and he killed the great men of state of that land.401 He then returned to al-Madāʾin, having brought under his control all those regions of the land of Rûm and Armenia that are situated on this side of Heraclea plus the whole area between his capital and the sea,402 in the region of Aden. He appointed al-Mundhir b. al-Nuʿmān as king over the Arabs and loaded him with honors.403 Then he took up residence in his own kingdom at al-Madāʾin, and

399. The truce was denounced by Justinian because of Persian operations in 541 in the Black Sea region of Lazica, which was adjacent to Byzantine defense points in eastern Pontus and which had been recently Christianized, and because of what were regarded as unjustified exactions of Khusraw from the people of the Byzantine fortified points and towns in Upper Mesopotamia during the previous year, leading to Persian invasions of Upper Mesopotamia in 542, of Armenia in 543, and of Upper Mesopotamia again in 544. In the course of this last campaign, Edessa was strenuously besieged by the Persians [see on this event, J. B. Segal, Edessa, The Blessed City, 105, 113, 158-60]. There does not, however, seem to have been at any of these times a Persian advance into southern Anatolia as far as Heraclea (the Hirɑqlah of later Islamic historians and geographers, modern Ereğli, see on it Ḥāqūt, Buldān, V, 398-99; Le Strange, Lands, 149, EP, s.v. Ereğli [J. H. Mordtmann-F. Taeschner], which, according to the contemporary church historian Evagrius Scholasticus, was not sacked by the Persians till much later, in the time of Justin II [r. 565-78]. The mention of Alexandria [in Egypt!] must be a confusion with the Persian invasion of Egypt under Khusraw II Abarwêz some seventy years later in the imperial reign of Heraclius [see al-Ṭabarî, I, 1002, pp. 318-19 below]. But as al-Ṭabarî says here, Edessa had been forced to pay an indemnity to the Persians after the final siege, and the peace or five years' truce of 545 beween Khusraw and Justinian involved the handing over by the Greeks of a substantial indemnity. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 427-49; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 91-112; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 492-502; Frye, “The Political History,” 155-56; Lang, “Iran, Armenia and Georgia,” 521.

400. Presumably a repetition of the notice by al-Ṭabarî at I, 895, p. 151 above, of the emperor's Caucasian expedition.

401. An anticipatory mention of the South Arabian expedition, see al-Ṭabarî, I, 947ff., pp. 238ff. below.

402. Following the text's n. f, with the correct reading of the Sprenger ms. al-bahr for the text's al-Bahrâyın.

turned his attention once more to affairs needing his personal care. After this, he led an expedition against the Hephthalites, seeking revenge for his grandfather Fayruz. Previously, Anūsharwān had married Khāqān’s daughter, so he now wrote to him before setting off on the expedition, informing him of his intentions and enjoining him to march against the Hephthalites. Anūsharwān came up against them, killed their king, and extirpated the whole of his family. He penetrated to Balkh and what lies beyond it and quartered his troops in Farghānah. He then returned home from Khurāsān. When he got back to al-Madā’in, a deputation came to him seeking help against the Abyssinians. So he sent back with them one of his commanders heading an army of the men of Daylam and adjacent regions; they killed the Abyssinian Masrūq in Yemen and remained there.

Thus Kīsrā enjoyed an unbroken run of victories and conquests; all the nations were in awe of him; and numerous delegations from the Turks, the Chinese, the Khazars, and similar [distant] nations thronged his court. He lavished generosity on scholars. He reigned for forty-eight years. The birth of the Prophet fell within

404. In the account of these events at I, 895, p. 152 above, it is the Khāqān of the Turks who kills the Hephthalite king W.r.z/Warāz. The name of the Turkish princess whom Khusraw is said here to have married (the future mother of his successor Hormizd IV) is given by al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 211 = § 632 as the un-Turkish-looking Faqum (thus vocalized by Pellat; the reading is dubious, but an Armenian author has Kaïen, according to Noldeke, trans. 264 n. 4). Although an Arabic geographer like Ibn Khurradādhbih, al-Masālik wa-al-mamālik, 30, says that Khusraw supposedly constructed the town of Farghānah, it seems most unlikely that Sāsānid power ever extended into the Farghānah valley of Central Asia. Marquart, Erānšahr, 219–20, endeavored to make sense of this piece of information by relating it to a Wādi Farghānah south of Baghān in the southern part of Tukhāristān, mentioned in the accounts of the Arab invasions of northern Afghanistan; but this seems very forced. See also Noldeke, trans. 167 nn. 2–3.

405. See al-Ṭabari, I, 948–50, 952–57, pp. 238–42, 244–50 below, for the story of the expedition to Yemen. The Daylāmis, mountainers from the region of Daylam in the Elburz Mountains at the southwestern corner of the Caspian Sea, were often employed as mercenary infantrymen and alpine troops by the Sāsānids, and Procopius mentions Dolomitae in Khusraw’s operations in Georgia and Lazica. See EP, s.v. Daylam (V. Minorsky). Khusraw’s recourse to marginal peoples like the Daylāmis seems to have arisen from an increasing shortage of military manpower from the traditional Persian sources, i.e., the indigenous mailed cavalrymen of the aswār class (on whom see n. 238 above), during his reign, and part of what Zeev Rubin has called the “barbarization” of the Persian army at this time, a parallel to what happened in the Roman world. See Rubin, “The Reforms of Khusro Anūshirwān,” 284–85.
the latter part of Anūsharwān's reign. Hīshām [Ibn al-Kalbī] has related that Anūsharwān's reign was (only) forty-seven years. He also related that 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God’s father, was born during his reign [in the twenty-fourth year of this, and that he died] in the forty-second year of his dominion.

Hīshām also related: When Anūsharwān's position became assured, he sent a message to al-Mundhir b. al-Nu’mān the Elder [al-Akbar], whose mother was Mā’ al-Sama’, a woman of al-Namir [tribe], and appointed him as king over al-Ḥirah and the lands over which the House of al-Ḥārith b. ‘Amr Ākil al-Murar used to rule, and al-Mundhir remained in this office continuously until he died. He also related: Anūsharwān led an expedition against the 406. This based on the traditional dating of the Prophet's birth to ca. 570. See al-Ṭabari, I, 900, pp. 163–64 and nn. 414, 640 below.

---

407. The words between the parentheses supplied by Nöldeke, trans. 168, from other, parallel texts as necessary to complete the text where there is an obvious omission.

408. How Ḥujr, the essential founder of Kindī greatness in Najd at this time [see p. 122 and n. 312 above] and grandfather of al-Ḥārith [on whom, see Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 51–69], gained the nickname ākil al-murar, “eater of bitter herbs,” is unclear, although the Arabic sources give two not very convincing explanations [see Olinder, op. cit., 42; Robin, “Le royaume ḥujride,” 3]. But Arabic murār is virtually identical with Akkadian murdru, “bitter lettuce,” and possibly connected with ṭrrū, “a medical plant of the Cucurbitaceae family, possibly the colocynth” [see The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, Letter M, Part II, 218, Letters I–J, 182–83]. R. Campbell Thompson thought that ṭrrū was Papaver, probably rhoeas L., the poppy [A Dictionary of Assyrian Botany, 223–29]. We are clearly dealing with bitter herbs used as a medicament, and possibly, in the light of Campbell Thompson’s definition of ṭrrū, with a pain-killing or narcotic drug.

409. Concerning Khusrav’s appointment (or more probably, confirmation; see pp. 140–41 and n. 362 above) of al-Mundhir III as his deputy on the fringes of Iraq and in northern and eastern Arabia, al-Ṭabari records, at I, 958, p. 253 below, this time from Ibn Iṣḥāq, that, after the peace treaty of 531 with Justinian, the Persian emperor appointed the Lakhmīd as ruler over all the Arabian lands as far as Bahrain, ‘Umān, Yamāmah, al-Ṭā’if, and Ḥijāz. See Smith, “Events in Arabia in the Sixth Century A.D.,” 442, and al-Ṭabari, I, 958, pp. 252–53 below). The rivalry of the houses of Lakhm and Kindah was thus bound to be intensified.

As well as Kindah’s rivaling with Lakhm over control of Najd, the lands of Bahrain and Ḥijāz in eastern Arabia were controled at this time by a subordinate branch of Kindah under Mu’āwiyah al-Jaww (“the dark colored one”), brother of ’Amr al-Maqṣūr and son of Ḥujr, which persisted there under Mu’āwiyah’s descendants until the time of the Prophet [see Olinder, “Āl al-Gau of the Family of Ākil al-Murar,” 208–29]. As noted at p. 122 n. 312 above, it certainly seems that there was a Kindī “kingdom,” or rather, an assemblage of tribes ruled by a Kindī chief Burjān, then turned back and built [the town of] al-Bāb and the Caspian Gates [al-Abwāb].

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

Hishām related: There reigned as king over the Arabs, as appointee of the Persian kings after al-Aswād b. al-Mundhir, his centered on Najd and under the suzerainty of the Kings of Ḥimyar, a subordination explicit in two South Arabian inscriptions [Ry 445 and 446] from Ma‘ṣal al-Jumh, 240 km/150 miles west-south-west of modern al-Riyād and dating from the mid-fifth century and 631 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 521–52, respectively. (De Blois is followed here for beginning the Sabaeans or Ḥimyarite era in April 110 B.C., rather than 115 B.C., i.e., converting the South Arabian era to the Christian one by subtracting 115 years and not 110 years—a “short chronology”—causes fewer problems that that of 115 years. See de Blois, “The Date of the ‘Martyrs of Nagrān,’” 119–30, and also Robin, who follows de Blois in this, in his L’Arabie antique de Karib’îl à Mahomet, 33, and also his “Le royaume Ḥjurīde,” 691; cf. also EI², s.v. Ta’rikh, I, Dates and Eras in the Islamic World, 1. In the Sense of Date, Dating, etc. [de Blois].) The two inscriptions name Kindah and Ma‘add as among the Arab auxiliaries and allies of the kings of Ḥimyar (see Robin, “Le royaume Ḥjurīde,” 675–95). Dating from some three decades after the second Ma‘ṣal al-Jumh inscriptions, the inscription of the well of Murayghan, situated to the north of Najrān and east of what is now now ‘Asir (Ry 503), records that the men of Kindah and Khindif fought in the army of the Abyssinian viceroy Abrahāh when this last governor marched against the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III’s son ‘Amr (the later ‘Amr III; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 900, p. 163 and n. 414 below) and his Bedouin allies. The main force under Abrahāh himself engaged the Ma‘add in a battle at Ḥulubān or Ḥalābān, not far to the south of Ma‘ṣal al-Jumh (the name vocalized as Ḥulubān in al-Bakrī, Mu‘jam mā ista‘jam, I, 491, and Ḥalābān in Yaqūt, Buldān, II, 281–82; see on the place Thilo, Die Ortsnamen der alt-arabischen Poesie, 53: a wadi arising in the Arwā chain and running into the Wādi Rikā, cf. his Map D). The Ma‘add were decisively defeated and forced to give hostages, while another force, which included men of the tribes of Sa‘d and Murād, operated in the territory of the Banu ‘Āmir b. Sa‘ṣa‘ah and defeated the ‘Āmir at Turabah, some 100 km/60 miles to the east-southeast of al-Ṭā‘īf. Al-Mundhir then had to sue for peace from Abrahāh and send hostages to Yemen. The inscription dates these events to 662 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 552–53. Much has been written on the inscription and the events it describes. Among all this, see Beeston, “Notes on the Mureighan Inscription,” 389–92; Smith, “Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 435–37; M. J. Kister, “The Campaign of Ḥulubān. A New Light on the Expedition of Abraha,” 425–36.

410. That is, against the Bulghars of the Middle Volga; this must be a legendary touch, unless it is a reminiscence of the events already noted in al-Ṭabarī, I, 895–96, pp. 151–53 above. On Bāb al-Abwāb or Darband, see pp. 151, 153 and nn. 390, 394 above.

brother al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān, whose mother was Hirr bt. al-Nu’mān, and who reigned for seven years. After him there reigned al-Nu'mān b. al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Umm al-Malik bt. 'Amr b. Hujr, the sister of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Khazraj b. Ta'ym Allāh b. al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ. He reigned for three years. Then there reigned al-Mundhir b. Imri' al-Qays al-Bad', i.e., Dhū al-Qarnayn. Hishām related: He was only thus called on account of two plaits made from his hair.413 His mother was Mā' al-Sama', that is, Mariyah bt. 'Awf b. Jusham b. Hilāl b. Rabi'ah b. Sayd Manāt b. 'Amir al-Ḍāḥyān b. Sa'd b. al-Khazzraj b. Taym Allāh b. al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ. He reigned for a total of forty-nine years. Then there reigned his son 'Amr b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Hind bt. al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār and who reigned for ten years.414 He related: After 'Amr b. Hind had been reigning for eight years and eight months, the Messenger of God was born; that was in the time of Anūshar-

412. Reading uncertain.

413. An unconvincing explanation for an appellation already well known as a by-name that was generally applied to Alexander the Great in Arabic lore, including in the Qurʾān, see n. 443 below. Its origin, if ever known, must have been forgotten by Ibn al-Kalbi's time.

414. Ibn al-Kalbi's filiation of the Lakhmīd kings has come down to us in two slightly different versions, the one given here by al-Ṭabarī (and in part, in various other places in his History) and the other utilized by Ḥamzah al-Īṣḥāḥānī, Ta'rikh, 83–97, for his section on the Lakhmīds. Sidney Smith thought that Ibn al-Kalbi derived information here from a Sāsānid register of years, "used with remarkable fidelity." The two versions are compared, together with others in the Arabic historical sources, and a harmonization attempted, by Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 50ff.; see now Smith, "Events in Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 429–30.

The accession of 'Amr III b. al-Mundhir III, also called 'Amr b. Hind after his mother, the Kindī princess, should be placed in 554, with what was apparently a smooth succession to his father, and the duration of his reign was sixteen years (as in Rothstein's table, 53, following the figure of sixteen in Ḥamzah al-Īṣḥāḥānī, op. cit. 94, pace the one given here by al-Ṭabarī of ten years. This would place 'Amr's death—as a result of being assassinated by the poet 'Amr b. Kulthūm—in 569 or in 570, the traditional but impossible date given for the "Year of the Elephant" at Mecca. See for 'Amr's reign (he had a reputation for firm rule and cruel behavior, seen in the celebrated affair of the "letter of al-Mutallamīs," see n. 774 below), Nöldeke, trans. 170 n. 1, 172 n. 1; Rothstein, op. cit., 94–102; E2, s.v. 'Amr b. Hind (A.J. Wensinck). See for the chronological difficulties involved in placing the Prophet Muḥammad's birth in the eighth year of 'Amr's reign, Smith, op. cit., 434.
wān and the "Year of the Elephant" in which al-Ashram Abū Yaksūm led an attack on the Ka'bah.415

[The History of Yemen]

Mention of the Rest of the Story of Tubba' in the Days of Qubādh and the Time of Anūsharwān and the Persians' Dispatch of an Army to Yemen in Order to Combat the Abyssinians, and the Reason for This Last.416

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: When Tubba' II (al-Ākhar), that is, Tubān As'ād Abū Karib, came back from the East, he traveled via Medina.417 When he had passed by it at the beginning of his expedition [i.e., on his outward journey], he had not aroused any feelings of disquiet among its people, but had left behind there in their midst one of his sons, who had [subsequently] been treacherously slain.

415. See on this attack, al-Ṭabarānī, I, 936–46, pp. 222–35 below. The patronymic Abū Yaksūm refers to the Abyssinian viceroy of South Arabia, Abrahāh, also known as al-Ashram "the man with his nose-tip cut off," whose son Yaksūm was to succeed him as governor in South Arabia. See al-Ṭabarānī, I, 931, p. 213, below, for the alleged occasion of this mutilation, and I, 945, pp. 235–36 below, for Yaksūm's reign. The actual name Yaksūm must stem from the toponym Aksum, the capital of the first Abyssinian kingdom, which lasted up to this sixth century.

416. Noldke omitted from his translation the section beginning here at I, 901 l. 1, as far as 917 l. 17.

417. The following section, up to I, 917 l. 17, depends on the parallel account of Ibn Ḥishām, in essence only moderately different from that of Ibn al-Kalbī, but it must be taken as a later growth of legendary history of a type similar to that in the Alexander Romance, which may have influenced it. The section is reproduced substantially by Ibn Ḥishām in the Sirāt al-nabi of Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, 12ff. — ed. al-Saqqa et al. I, 19ff., trans., 6ff.; cf. Ibn Hishām, Kitāb al-tijān, 297–300, and F. Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 227–28.

Abū Karib As'ād himself was, however, a fully historical person, leaving aside the legendary accretions, the 'bkrb 's'd of the Ḥimyaritic inscriptions. In the first half of the fourth century he expanded his territories from southwestern and southern Arabia into central Arabia. He inflated the royal title of the founder Shamīr Yū:rīsh from that of "lord of Saba, DhūRAYdān, Hāḍramawt and Ymn't" to include "and of their Arabs [i.e., Bedouins] in Ṭawdīm and Tiḥāmah," and succeeding Tubba' kings also used this fuller title [in Classical Arabic, ṭawd means "mountain"; for al-Hamdānī, Šīfāt jazīrat al-'Arab, 371, al-Ṭawd denoted the mountain range of the Sarāt, which divided Yemen between its coastland, tiḥāmah, and its inland plateau, nājd]. His fame ensured the later growth around him of a fantastic romance and epic similar to that of, and, as noted above, conceivably inspired by, that of Alexander the Great. See EP, s.v. Tubba' [A. F. L. Beeston].
Hence he now came to the town with the intention of reducing it to ruins, extirpating its people and cutting down its date palms. When they heard of his plans, this tribe (ḥayy) of the Anṣār banded together against him in order to defend themselves. Their chief at that time was 'Amr b. al-Ṭallah, one of the Banū al-Najjār, and then of the Banū 'Amr b. Mabdhūl.418 They sallied forth to attack Tubba'. When Tubba' had encamped [with his troops] by the Medinans, one of the latter from the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, called Aḥmar, had killed one of Tubba’'s followers whom he had found cutting down the date clusters of a tree that belonged to him. He had therefore struck him with his reaping hook and killed him, saying, “The fruit belongs to the one who nurtures it and makes it grow!” After killing him, he had thrown the corpse into a well-known local well called Dhāt Tūmān (?); this naturally increased Tubba’'s rage against them, and the two sides became engaged in making war and fighting other. He related: The Anṣār assert that they used to fight Tubba’ by day but treat him as a guest each night. Tubba' was amazed at this and used to say, “By God, these people of ours are generous of heart!”

While he was engaged thus, there came to him two rabbis from the Jews of the Banū Qurayẓah, learned scholars with firmly grounded knowledge, who had heard about Tubba’'s intention of destroying the town and its people.419 They told him, “O King, don't do it, for if you persist in carrying out your plan, something will intervene to prevent you, and we fear that you will bring down on yourself speedy retribution.” He said to them, “How can

418. This is an anachronism, in that the designation of Anṣār “ Helpers” was only given to his supporters in Medina by the Prophet after his hijrah of 622, and an inaccuracy in that it was not, of course, a tribal name. The Arabs inhabiting Yathrib, as it was mainly called in pre-Islamic times [see n. 370 above], were from the Banū Qaylah bt. Ḥalik, with its two branches of the Aws and the Khazraj. Al-Najjār were a clan of the Khazraj, and the 'Amr b. Mabdhūl part of their subclan Māzin. The 'Adī mentioned below were another subclan. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176–77, 185, II, 31, 34–35, 347; Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 256; Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Medina, genealogical table at 154.

419. Qurayẓah were one of the three main Jewish tribes in Medina, confederates of the Aws; they nevertheless suffered the massacre of their menfolk and the enslavement of their women and children by Muhammad in 6/627 after the siege of Medina by Quraysh and their allies. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 273–77; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 193ff.; EP, s.v. Kurayza (W. M. Watt).
that be? They replied, "It is the place to which a prophet, who will arise out of the tribe of Quraysh at the end of time, will migrate, and it will be his home and resting place." After having heard these words, Tubba' desisted from what he had intended to do regarding Medina, perceiving that the two rabbis had special knowledge and being amazed at what he had heard from them. He departed from Medina, took them with him to Yemen, and embraced their religion. The names of the two rabbis were Ka'b and Asad, both from the Banū Qurayṣah and paternal cousins of each other. They were the most knowledgeable persons of their age, as Ibn Ḥumayd has mentioned to me—Saḥamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. 'Amr—Abān b. Abī 'Ayyāsh—Anas b. Mālik—shaykhs from his people (sc., of Medina) who went back to the Jāhiliyyah.

A certain poet of the Ānṣār, one Khālid421 b. 'Abd al-'Uzza b.
Ghaziiyyah b. 'Amr b. 'Abd b. 'Awf b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, recited these verses about the warfare between the Medinans and Tubba', vaunting 'Amr b. al-Ṭallah and mentioning his merits and his resolute defense:

Has he relinquished youthful folly, or has its remembrance ceased? Or has he obtained his fill of pleasure?

Or have you remembered youth? And what a memory of youth or of its times you have!422

For indeed, it was a young man’s war (literally, the war of a beast which sheds its two teeth next to the incisors at its fourth or later year, rubā'ī, or of a young man similarly shedding teeth, rabā'ī), whose like brings to a youth experience and esteem.423

420 The names of the two rabbis as given here come from the Ibn Ishaq version of this story, from an uncertain source; but Michael Lecker has recently pointed out that the late-period historian of Medina Nūr al-Dīn 'Ali b. Ahmad al-Ŝamhūdī [d.
911/1506] cites an alternative tradition from the second/eighth-century historian of Medina Ibn Zabālah that the names of the two men were Suḥayṭ/Suḫayṭ and Munabbih, from the Medinan Jewish tribe of Hadl, who were actually clients of the more powerful Qurayṣah. See al-Ŝamhūdī, Wafā' al-wafā', I, 1909, Lecker, "The Conversion of Ḥimyar to Judaism and the Jewish Banū Hadl of Medina," 134–35.
421. The Cairo text, II, 106, has for this name khāl "the maternal uncle of . . . ."
422. An alternative translation of the second sentence in the line might be "And what is it that you remember? Youth or the passing of the whole span of life?"
423. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DxcI, Thorbecke's reading atā, "brings to," for the text's atā, "comes." One might also render the last word
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

So ask 'Imrān or ask Asd, then, at the time when [the army] came, when the morning star was still visible, then an army headed by Abū Karib, with their bodies clad in long coats of mail and with pungent reek. Then they said, Who is coming along with them, the Banū 'Awf or al-Najarah? O Banū al-Najjār, indeed we have a burden of taking vengeance on them from long ago! Then there went forth to encounter them in battle a body of lofty warriors ('ashannaqah), whose extent was like that of a sheet of falling rain drops. A chief who is on a level of prestige with kings; whoever would make war on 'Amr does not realize his eminence. A man of the Anṣār, mentioning their fierce resistance to Tubba', has said:

You impose upon me, among other duties in regard to it, [defense of] the date palm groves of al-Asāwif and al-Manṣā'ah, ‘ībarah as “a moral example.”

424. 'Imrān is not common in tribal genealogies, but may conceivably refer to the 'Imrān b. Hudhmah, a branch of the tribe of Muzaynah who lived to the south of Medina; see Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 88, II, 357; EP, s.v. Muzayna (F. M. Donner). Asd is, of course, the great tribe of Asd or Azd ('sd being the form in the South Arabian inscriptions), with its two branches originally centered on 'Uman and the Sarat mountain chain in 'Asir respectively; see EP, s.v. Azd (G. Strenziok).

425. The name 'Awf occurs in the genealogies of a large number of Arab tribes, while al-Najjār b. Tha'labah were a subclan of the Medinan Khazraj; see Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 185, II, 442. What is unclear is whether the Najarah are identical with the Banū al-Najjār of the next line, the difficulty in identifying them as a single unit being that the 'Awf and the Najarah are apparently among the attackers, whereas one would expect the Banū al-Najjār to be among the defenders of their town.

426. Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstefeld, 14 - ed. Muṣṭafā al-Saqqā et al., I, 23, has musāyi'ah, “a body of swordsmen,” for this rare word 'ashannaqah, hence probably a lectio facilior.

427. Ibn Hishām, loc. cit., inserts here a line, “Among them is 'Amr b. Ṭallah; may God grant him long life for the welfare of his people!” which serves as a link between the preceding and following verses and elucidates the ‘Amr who is subsequently praised.

428. Al-Asāwif is the plural, used here for metrical purposes, one assumes, of al-Aswaf, a place outside Medina but regarded as coming within the Haram estab-
Date palm groves the Banū Mālik have protected from the terrifying cavalry hosts of Abū Karib.

He related: Tubba' and his people were devotees of idols and worshiped them. He set out toward Mecca, this being on his route back to Yemen, until when he was at al-Duff in the district of Jumdān, between 'Usfān and Amaj, a point along his way between Mecca and Medina, a group of men from Hudhayl met him and said, "O king, allow us to lead you to an ancient, largely obliterated treasury which previous monarchs have overlooked and which contains pearls, chrysoliths, rubies, gold, and silver." He replied, "Yes, indeed," and they went on to say, "It is a temple in Mecca which its people worship and pray by." The Hudhalis, however, intended by that Tubba's destruction, because they knew full well that if any king had any bad intentions concerning the Ka'bah or acted deceitfully in regard to it, he would perish. When he had agreed to their proposal, he sent for the two rabbis lished by the Prophet around the town. See Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Āthīr, Al-Nihāyah fi gharib al-hadīth, II, 422; al-Bakri, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 151; al-Samhūdi, Wafta' al-wafā', IV, 1125-26. Al-Manṣa'ah, on the contrary, would be the singular of a place-name normally found in the plural, al-Manāṣi’, literally “places set apart,” i.e., for purposes of fulfilling the needs of nature, outside Medina, specifically for the women of the town to use at night, and figuring as such in the famous hadīth al-ifk, “affair of the lie,” involving ‘A’ishah and her calumniators. See Majd al-Dīn Ibn Athīr, op. cit., V, 65; al-Samhūdi, op. cit., IV, 1313.

429. These places all lay to the north of Mecca, with 'Usfān in the transition zone between the coastal plain, the Tiḥāmah, and the Hijāz mountain chain, the Sarāt, and the others on the road to Medina across the mountains. For al-Duff, see Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 458. For Jumdān, see al-Bakri, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, II, 391-92, and Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 162, respectively, describing it as a mountain in the territory of Sulaym and a mountain in the ḥarrah, or lava field, of Dariyyah. 'Usfān is frequently mentioned in early Islamic sources as two stages from Mecca, and still exists as a village. See al-Bakri, op. cit., III, 942-43, placing it in the territory of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq of Khuzā'ah; Yāqūt, op. cit., IV, 120-21; Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der altarabischen Poesie, 109 and Map C; Abdullah Al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz in the Writings of the Arab Geographers 800-1150, 284-89. Amaj was an oasis settlement in the territory of Khuzā'ah. According to al-Bakri, op. cit., I, 190-92, and according to Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 249-50, it was in the region of Medina; see also Al-Wohaibi, op. cit., 120-22, 186.

430. Hudhayl b. Mudrikah were a tribe, accounted North Arab in genealogy, from the Khindīf branch of Muḍar, hence related to Quraysh of Mecca, whose territory was in the vicinity of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 3, 58, II, 7, 286; EP, s.v. Hudhayl [G. Rentz].

431. That is, the Ka'bah, regarded, as is stated below, as having been founded by Ibrāhīm [Abraham] and his son Ismā'īl [Ishmael].
and asked them about it. They told him: “The sole intention of these people is to bring about your destruction and the destruction of your army. If you do what they are urging you to do, you and everyone with you will assuredly perish en bloc.” Tubba’ said, “What then do you advise me to do when I get to the temple?” They replied, “When you get there, do as its devotees do: circumambulate it, venerate and honor it, shave your head in its presence and behave with humility until you leave its precincts.” He asked them, “What is preventing you yourselves from doing that?” They retorted, “By God, it is indeed the temple of our forefather Abraham, and it is just as we have informed you, but the local people have interposed as obstacles, between us and the temple, various idols they have set up around it, and blood they shed there. They are unclean polytheists,” or words to that effect.\footnote{According to Muslim lore, the primitive monotheism of Abraham, the millat Ibrahim, became corrupted after his time by polytheistic practices such as are mentioned here, so that by Muhammad’s time it had become an idol temple. Whether the tawāf or circumambulation, and the requirement of shaving the head, part of the ihram, practices mentioned here, were part of the rites of the Ka’bah in the two or three centuries before the coming of Muhammad, the age of the Tubba’s, is unknown; but it seems quite likely that such taboos and ritual practices did exist well before their formalization under Islam as the manāsik al-hajj. See M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, étude d’histoire religieuse, 30ff.; EP, s.v. Ka’bah [A. J. Wensinck].}

Tubba’ recognized the soundness of their advice and the veraciousness of their words. He had the group of Hudhalis brought in, and cut off their hands and feet. Then he proceeded onwards till he reached Mecca. It was revealed to him in a dream that he should cover over the temple, so he covered it with sheets of woven palm leaves. Then in a second dream it was revealed to him that he should cover it with something better than that, so he covered it with Yemeni cloth (al-ma‘āfir). Then in a third dream, that he should cover it with something even better than that, so he covered it with women’s robes and pieces of finely woven Yemeni cloth joined together (al-mulā‘āh wa-al-wuga’il). According to what they assert, Tubba’ was the first person to put a covering over the Ka’bah.\footnote{For the kiswah or covering, see Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, 33; idem, “Le voile de la Ka’bah,” 5–211, EP, s.v. Ka’bah 1. [A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier].} He also ordered its guardians, from Jurhum,\footnote{Jurhum were an ancient tribe, accounted Yemeni in genealogy, who were said to have migrated northward to Ḥijāz and to have taken over Mecca and its}
to look after it and to keep it in a state of ritual purity, not letting any blood, dead bodies, or milāth, that is, [cloth used for] menstruation, come near it, and he provided it with a door and a key. Then he set out for Yemen accompanied by his troops and the two rabbis. When he reached Yemen he summoned its people to enter into the same religion as he had done, but they refused until they were able to test it by means of ordeal by fire, which they had in Yemen. 435

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Mālik b. Tha‘labah b. Abī Mālik al-Quraẓī,436 who said: I heard Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. Ubaydallah relate that, when Tubba‘ drew near to Yemen in order to enter it, the Ḥimyarites blocked his way to it, telling him that he could not enter it because he had abandoned their religion. He invited them to accept his (new) faith, saying, “It is a better religion than yours.” They retorted, “In that case, come and settle the matter with us by the ordeal of fire,” and he agreed. He related: According to what the Yemenis assert, there was in Yemen a fire, by means of which they would settle matters in dispute among themselves; the fire would devour the wrongdoer but leave the one who had suffered injury unscathed. When they told this to Tubba‘, he replied, “You have made a fair proposition.” So his people (i.e., the Ḥimyarites) went forth with their idols and with other sacred objects they were accustomed to utilize in their religion, while the two rabbis went forth with their sacred codices (maṣāḥifihim)437 hanging round their necks until they halted in front of the fire by the place where it blazed forth. The fire leapt out toward them, and when it neared them they withdrew from it in great fear. But those people present urged them onward and instructed them to stand firm. So they stood

435. This story is also in Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, 14–15 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 237, trans. 8–9; idem, Kitāb al-Tijān, 294–96; al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 84–86.

436. Some male members of the Jewish tribe of Qurayẓah apparently survived the massacre mentioned in n. 419 above.

437. These mushafs could have been made up of flat leaves, loose or sewn, or of rolled-up leaves, both procedures being apparently known in earliest Islam and doubtless before then. See EP, s.v. Şahifa [A. Ghédira].
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

their ground until the fire covered them and consumed the idols and the sacred objects they had brought along, together with the men of Ḥimyar who were bearing them. The two rabbis then went forth with their sacred codices round their necks, with their foreheads dripping with sweat but the fire did not harm them at all. At this, the Ḥimyarites agreed to accept Tubba’s religion; from this time onward, and because of this episode, was the origin of Judaism in Yemen.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Ishaq—one of his colleagues, that the two rabbis and the Ḥimyarites who went out with them at that same time only followed the track of the fire in order to repel it, for they said that whoever was able to drive it back was the most worthy of credence. When some of the Ḥimyarites came with their idols near to it in order to drive it back, the fire came on at them in order to consume them, hence they retreated and were unable to drive it back. But when the two rabbis drew near to it after that, and began to recite the Torah, the fire began to recede until they had driven it back to its place of origin. Thereupon, the Ḥimyarites adopted the two rabbis’ religion.

Now Ri’ām was one of the temples they used to venerate and where they offered up slaughtered beasts and from which they used to speak under inspiration, this during the time when they were polytheists. The two rabbis told Tubba’ that it was only a demon (shayṭān) that lured them into evil ways and made them its sport, and they asked him to let them deal with it how they would. He replied, “Just go ahead with it!” The Yemenis assert that the two rabbis drew out from it a black dog, which they

438. Al-Hamdānī, Sīfat jazīrat al-‘Arab, 268, 365, describes Ri‘ām/Ri‘ām as one of the fortresses and castles [mahāfīd, qaṣāf; for the first term, sing. maḥfād, maḥfīd, see C. Landberg, Glossaire datnotis, I, 442-30] of Yemen and as one of the shrines of the Arabs [mawādī al-‘ibādah], located in the territory of the Hamdān (i.e., in that part of northern Yemen between Ṣan‘ā’ and Ṣa‘dah). Ibn al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-aṣnām, ed. Aḥmad Zaki Pasha, in Klinke-Rosenberger, Das Götzenbuch, text, 7-8, Ger. trans. 35, comm. 87, Eng. trans. Faris, 10-11, states that it was a sanctuary of the Ḥimyarites at Ṣan‘ā’ and that there was an oracle there. The existence of both the place and the shrine at Rymūm where the god Ta‘lāb was venerated, is confirmed by South Arabian inscriptions. See Fahd, Le panthéon de l’Arabie centrale à la veille de l’hégire, 141-43; W. W. Müller, “Ancient Castles Mentioned in the Eighth Volume of al-Hamdānī’s Iklil,” 154.
slaughtered. They also tore down that temple; its remains, according to what has been mentioned to me, can still be seen today in Yemen at Riʿām, with traces of the blood that used to be poured over it.439

Tubbaʾ composed the following verses about that journey of his; what he had intended to do at Medina and the Kaʾbah; how he dealt with the men of Hudhayl when they told him what they in fact told him; what he did regarding the Holy House when he came to Mecca, that is, putting a cover over it and purifying it; and what the two rabbis told him about the Messenger of God’s future role:

Why [O my soul] is your sleep troubled, like that of one with bleary, diseased eyes, suffering from sleeplessness, as if kept awake incessantly?

Feeling rage against two Jewish tribes who settled at Yathrib, who richly deserve the punishment of a day of violence!440

When I made my dwelling place at Medina, my slumber there was sweet and refreshing.

I made space for a dwelling place on a hill between al-ʿAqīq and Baqiʾ al-Gharqad.441

We left behind its tract of dark-colored rocks and its plateaux, and its salt flats extending on a bare plain,

And we descended to Yathrib, with our breasts raging with anger at the killing of a slaughtered one (i.e., Tubbaʾ’s son).

---

440. There were, of course, more than two Jewish tribes living in Medina at the time of the hijrah and almost certainly before then. Their presence there may even date to the diaspora from Palestine down the Wādī al-Qurā in western Arabia after such cataclysms for the Jewish people as the Roman emperor Titus’s sack of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the suppression of the revolt of Bar Kokhba in A.D. 132, the question of the origins of the communities of Jews [or Judaised Arabs?] in such oases of western Arabia as Fadak, Khaybar and Medina has been much discussed, without finality having been reached. For Judaism in South Arabia, see n. 486 below.

441. The Wādi al-ʿAqīq lay just to the west of Medina and is expressly lauded in Islamic tradition as “the blessed valley” because of the Prophet’s fondness for it. See EP, s.v. al-ʿAṣik [G. Rentz], Baqiʾ al-Gharqad was the first Muslim cemetery in Medina, much venerated in later times because so many of the Prophet’s family, the Companions, and other notable figures of early Islam were buried there. See EP, s.v. Baqiʾ al-Gharkad [A. J. Wensinck and A. S. Bazmee Ansari].
I have sworn a deliberate, binding vow, an oath which is, by your life, not to be rescinded,
“If I come to Yathrib, I will not suffer to remain in its central parts a single date cluster or any ripe dates.”

Until there came to me a learned scholar of Qurayzah, a rabbi to whom, by your life, the Jews accorded primacy.
He said, “Remove yourself from a settlement which is preserved [by God] for the prophet of Mecca from Quraysh, a divinely guided one.”

So I forgave them without any reproach, and left them to the requital of an everlasting day (sc., the Day of Judgment).
And I left them to God, for whose forgiveness I hope on the Day of Reckoning, [escaping] from the stoked-up flames of Hell.
I left behind at Yathrib for him a group of men from our people, men of personal achievement and valor, whose deeds are praised,
A group of men who will bring victory in their train; I hope thereby a reward from the lord of one worthy of praise.442
I did not realize that there was a pure house, consecrated to God in the hollow of Mecca, where He is worshiped, Until there came to me servile wretches from Hudhayl, at al-Duff of Jumdān above the ascent of the hill [al-musnad].

They said, “[There is] at Mecca a house of ancient, forgotten wealth, with treasures of pearls and chrysoliths.”

I wanted to get at them, but my Lord interposed between me and them, for God repels [profane ones] who would destroy the house of worship.
Hence I renounced my intentions against it and against the people of Yathrib, and left them as an example to the discerning.
Dhū al-Qarnayn before me submitted himself [to God], a king to whom the other kings became humble and thronged [his court].443

442. rabbi muhammadī, which could be taken as presaging the coming of the Prophet Muhammad.
443 “The man with the two horns” of Qur’ān, XVIII, 82–97/83–97, generally identified in Muslim lore with Alexander the Great, regarded by some authorities as a proto-Muslim because he spoke to the people of the West about God’s punish-
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

He reigned over the Eastern and Western lands, yet sought the means of knowledge from a wise, rightly guided scholar. He witnessed the setting of the sun in its resting place into a pool of black and foetid slime.

Before his time, Bilqîs was my paternal forebear (literally, "aunt") and ruled over them until the hoopoe came to her.⁴⁴⁴

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: They assert that, in regard to this tribe (hayy) of the Ṣâḥâr, Tubba' was only enraged at them because of the Jews who lived among them. Tubba' intended to destroy them when he came to them at Medina, but the Ṣâḥâr restrained him from them until he then departed. This was the reason for his saying in his poem,
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak 175

Feeling rage against two Jewish tribes who settled at Yathrib, who richly deserve the punishment of a day of violence!

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Iṣḥāq, who said: Before this, there had come to Tubba' Shāfi` b. Kulayb al-Ṣadafi, who was a soothsayer (kāhin). He stayed with Tubba', and when he signified his intention to say goodbye, Tubba' said, "What does there remain of your learning?" Shāfi` replied, "An eloquent piece of historical lore—and a veracious item of knowledge."445 He said, "Can you find a people with a kingdom equal in status to mine?" Shāfi` replied, "No, except that the king of Chassān has numerous offspring [naif]." Tubba' said, "Can you find any king superior to him in status?" He replied, "Yes." He said, "Who has such a kingdom?" He replied, "I find it belonging to a pious and God-fearing man—who has been made strong by conquests—and who has been described in the Scriptures (al-zabūr, literally "the Psalms of David")446—his community is given a superior status in the sacred books (al-sufūr)—and he will dispel darkness with light—Ahmad the prophet—blessed be his community until he comes!—[He is] one of the Banū Lu`ayy—and then of the Banū Quṣayy."447 Tubba' sent for a copy of the scrip-

445. The kāhin’s utterance here is, as usual with such gnomic pronouncements, in assonantal, rhymed prose (saj'). See Fahd, La divination arabe: Études religieuses, sociologiques et folkloriques sur le milieu natif de l’Islam, 151–53, EP, s.v. Sadj', i. As Magical Utterances in Pre-Islamic Arabian Usage (T. Fahd).

446. This term is used in the Qur’ān, in the singular, as here, for the Psalms, but in the plural al-zubūr for written inscriptions in general; A. Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur’ān, 148–49, see also EP, s.v. Zabūr [J. Horovitz], derived it from the Christian Orient. However, Mr. F. C. de Blois has pointed out to the present writer that a Sabaean verb zbr, "to write, inscribe," is now attested on the inscribed sticks that have been recently coming to light in Yemen, as described by W. W. Müller, "L’écriture zabūr du Yémen pré-islamique dans la tradition arabe," 35–39, who traces what appears to be the subsequent usage of the verb zabara in early Classical Arabic, perhaps influenced by Yemeni precursors and influences. It is accordingly possible that one should translate al-Tabarī’s text here, wa-wwuifa ft al-zabūr, as “and who has been described in the ancient written texts,” and the subsequent mention of Tubba’s sending for a copy of al-zabūr [here grammatically feminine, as if a collective] as simply for “ancient written documents.”

447. Quṣayy was the semilegendary hero of the Banū Lu`ayy of Fihr or Quraysh who was an ancestor, separated by five generations, of Muhammad/Ahmad. He is said to have restored the Ka`bah to the primitive monotheistic worship of the millat Ibrāhīm after the cult there had lapsed into pantheism under Jurhum (on whom see n. 434 above). See EP, s.v. Quṣayy [G. Levi Della Vida].
Holders of Power after Ardashīr b. Bābāk

tures and perused them; and lo and behold, he found there the Prophet’s description!

There related to us Ibn Ḫumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq, to whom someone had transmitted from Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ‘Abbās—others of the scholars of Yemen who relate traditions. Some of them transmitted part of the story, but all of that is gathered together in this present story, that there was a king from the Lakhm in Yemen among the Tubba’s of Ḥimyar, called Rabīʿah b. Naṣr. Before his period of royal power in Yemen there had reigned Tubba’ I, who was Zayd b. ‘Amr Dhi al-Adh’ār b. Abraham Dhi al-Manār b. al-Rāʾīsh b. Qays b. ʿ abortion b. Saba’ the Younger b. Kahf al-Zulm b. Zayd b. Sahl b. ‘Amr b. Qays b. Muʿāwiyyah b. Jusham b. Wāʾil b. al-Ghawth b. Qaṭān b. ‘Arīb b. Zuhayr b. Ayman b. Hamaysa’ b. al-ʿAranjaj Ḥimyar b. Saba’ the Elder b. Yaʾrub b. Yashjub b. Qaḥṭān. Saba’’s name was (really) ‘ʿAbd Shams, and he was only called Saba’, as they assert, because he was the first to take captives (sabā) among the Arabs. This is the ruling house of the kingdom of Ḥimyar, among whom were the Tubba’s.

After Tubba’ I there came Zayd b. ‘Amr and Shamir Yurʾish b. Yāsir Yunʾim b. ‘Amr Dhi al-Adh’ār his paternal cousin. It was Shamir Yur'ish who raided China, built Samarqand,\textsuperscript{452} and laid out as an encampment (\textit{hayyara}) al-\textit{Hirah},\textsuperscript{453} and it was he who recited the verses,

I am Shamir Abū Karib al-Yamānī; I urged on the horses from Yemen and Syria,

In order that I might attack the slaves who had rebelled against us, [when we were] in the lands beyond China, in 'Athm and Yām,\textsuperscript{454}

And then we shall inflict judgment in their lands with a just decision, which not a single youth shall survive.

... and so on to the end of the ode.

He related: Then there came after Shamir Yur'ish the son of Yāsir Yun'im, Tubba' the Lesser; namely, Tubān As'ad Abū Karib b. Malki Karib b. Zayd b. Tubba' I b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adhār.\textsuperscript{455} It was he who came to Medina and who took back the two Jewish rabbis to Yemen, who venerated the Holy House and put a covering on it and who recited the poetry which is well known.\textsuperscript{456} All these reigned before the royal power of Rabī'ah b. Naṣr al-Lakhmi, and had taken over Yemen from the kings of Saba' and Ḥaḍramawt in order to consolidate the new united kingdom in South Arabia [see n. 314 above]. See G. Ryckmans, \textit{L'institution monarchique en Arabie méridionale avant l'Islam. Ma'in et Saba',} \textit{210–12;} Robin, in \textit{Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible,} s.v. Sheba, II, cols. 1102, 1139–40.

\textsuperscript{452} See for details of these legendary trans-Asian raids, al-Ṭabarī, I, 890–92, pp. 142–45 above.

\textsuperscript{453} Virtually nothing is known of the history of al-\textit{Hirah} before the Lakhmids built it up into their capital [see nn. 76–79 above], but this story of its foundation by the Tubba's is pure invention, conceivably influenced, however, by the fact that Lakhm were considered genealogically to be a South Arab tribe [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 834, p. 44 and n. 132 above].

\textsuperscript{454} The Yām b. Aṣbā were a component tribe of the South Arabian Hamdān living in the Najrān area and several times mentioned by al-Hamdānī in his geographical work. The Banū Yām gave their name to one of the districts (mikhālif, pl. makhālif, see n. 462 below) of Yemen, that around their home. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, \textit{Jamhara al-nasab,} I, Table 229, II, 47, 590, \textit{EP,} s.v. Yām (G. R. Smith). The reading 'Athm is uncertain, but al-Maqdisi, \textit{Ahsan al-tagāṣim,} 88, registers a place 'Asham in the mikhāl of the Tihmāh, al-Hamdānī, \textit{Ṣifat jazirat al-'Arab,} 259, mentions this also as a mine (ma'din) in the Tihmāh of Yemen, while Yaqūt, \textit{Buldān,} IV, 126, has an 'Ashm in the northern Tihmāh.

\textsuperscript{455} See n. 417 above, for his place as founder of the 'Tubba' line.

when the latter died, the whole of the royal authority in Yemen reverted to Ḥassān b. Tubān (or Tibān) Asʿad Abī Karīb b. Malkī Karīb b. Zayd b. ʿAmr Dhi al-Adhār.

There related to us Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq, from a certain scholar, that Rabīʿah b. Naṣr had a dream that alarmed him and that continued to disquiet him.⁴⁵⁷ When he had this dream, he sent out enquiries among the people of his kingdom and gathered together in his presence every soothsayer, magician, drawer of omens from the flight of birds,⁴⁵⁸ and astrologer. Then he informed them, “I have had a dream which has alarmed me and caused me disquiet, so tell me its interpretation.” They replied, “Recount it to us, so that we might inform you of its meaning.” He replied, however, “If I recount it to you, I shall have no confidence that you will be able to tell me its correct interpretation; the only person who will know its correct interpretation is the one who already knows about the dream without my telling him.” When Rabīʿah had said all this to them, one of the assembled group of experts on dreams said, “If the king requires this, then he should send for Satīḥ and Shīqq, for there is no one more knowledgeable than these two, and they will certainly be able to tell you what you ask.” Satīḥ’s (real) name was Rabīʿ b. Rabīʿah b. Masʿūd ⁴⁵⁷ What we have here is a story from the South Arabian tradition, meant to explain the presence of the (genealogically) South Arabian Lakhmids in Iraq and al-Hirah. The story is traced back to the time of a generation after Shamīr Yūr’ish/Yuḥar’ish, i.e., the first part of the fourth century, and Rabīʿah b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī is made the father of ‘Adī, who in the Lakhmīd king lists dependent upon Ibn al-Kalbī (see n. 414 above) is regarded as the progenitor of the line, the first figure in the royal genealogy, father of ‘Amr I, the father of Imrūʾ al-Qays I. At the end of the story of the dream, the Lakhmids are made to migrate from Yemen to al-Hirah in order to escape the prophesied invasion of the Abyssinians, being allowed to settle at al-Hirah by the Persian king Shāpūr I (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 913–14, p. 182 below, and Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 39–40, who states that we know, concerning the origins of the kingdom based on al-Hirah, “so gut wie nichts”).

⁴⁵⁸ See for this person, the ʿaʿif, al-Ṭabarī, I, 1958, p. 395 and n. 970 above. Concerning this series of persons skilled in various types of prognostication, cf. the series of “magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, and the Chaldaean” whom Nebuchadnezzar summoned to interpret his dreams in Daniel ii. 2. For the practice of the interpretation of dreams, oneiromancy, a pseudo-science whose literature goes back through Classical Antiquity to Assyrian times and which in the Islamic period produced a considerable number of works on taʿbir al-ruʿya, dream interpretation books, see Fahd, La divination arabe, 247–367, and EP, s.v. Ruʿya [H. Daiber].

When they told Rabi‘ah that, he sent for the two men. Saṭīḥ came to him before Shiqq; there were no soothsayers (kuhhān) like them in their time. So when Saṭīḥ arrived, the king summoned him and said, “O Saṭīḥ, I have had a dream which has alarmed me and disquieted me, so tell me about it, for if you comprehend the dream correctly, you will know correctly its interpretation.” Saṭīḥ replied, “I will do this. You saw in your dream a skull (jumjumah) [Abū Ja’far [al-Tabarī says: I have found the rendering of it in other places as ‘... I saw blazing coals, humamah’]—which came forth from the darkness—and fell upon the lowlands descending to the sea—and devoured there everything with a skull!” The king said, “O Saṭīḥ, you have got it exactly right; so what, in your opinion, is the interpretation of it?” Saṭīḥ answered, “I swear by the serpent which is between the two harrahs⁴⁶⁰—the Abyssinians (al-Ḫabash)⁴⁶¹ will certainly swoop down on your land—and will then rule over all the land from Abyan to Jurash.”⁴⁶²

---

⁴⁵⁹. Saṭīḥ and Shiqq appear in Arabic lore as legendary personages, often described as barely human monsters, and they have roles in pre-Islamic history as diviners: here for the Lakhmid Rabi‘ah but also (anachronistically) for al-Nu‘mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (IV) and Khusraw Anūsharwān in predicting the fall of the Persian kingdom and the triumph of the Arabs [al-Ṭabarī, I, 981–84, pp. 285–89 below]. See Rothstein, Lakhmiden, 39, EP, s.vv. Saṭīḥ b. Rabi‘a [T. Fahd] and Shiqq [B. Carra de Vaux and T. Fahd].

⁴⁶⁰. The geographers enumerate large numbers of harrahs, basaltic lava fields, in the region between the Ḥawrān in southern Syria and Medina. See the long section in Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 245–50 [paraphrased and discussed by O. Loth, “Die Vulkanregionen von Arabien nach Yākūt,” 363–82], EP, s.v. Ḥarrā (ed.). Here the reference, if at all specific, is probably to two of the harrahs in the vicinity of Medina, which included the Ḥarrat Wāqim, site of a famous battle in 63/683 when the Umayyad army under Muslim b. ‘Uqba of the Mu‘arj defeated the Medinans there; see Loth, op. cit., 380.

⁴⁶¹. This designates here the people of al-Ḫabash, Ḥbs²t of the later Sabaean inscriptions. See EP, s.v. Ḥabashat [A. K. Irvine]. As observed by Irvine, there is no evidence for the statement in earlier authorities like Glaser and Rossini there that the Ḥbs²t may have been a South Arabian tribe in origin.

⁴⁶². Abyan was a mikhlaš of the southernmost tip of Arabia, comprising Aden and its eastward-stretching hinterland; see EP, s.v. Abyan [O. Lōfgren]. Jurash,
The king said to Sāṭīḥ, "By your father! O Sāṭīḥ, this is indeed distressing and painful for us; but when will this take place—in my own time, or subsequently?" Sāṭīḥ replied, "Nay, indeed, a good while after it—more than sixty or seventy years will elapse." The king said, "Will that dominion of theirs endure, or will it be cut short?" he answered, "Nay, it will be cut short after seventy-odd years have gone by—and then all of them there will be slain or will be expelled from it as fugitives." The king said, "Who, then, will assume that task of killing and expelling them?" Sāṭīḥ replied, "Iram of Dhū Yazan—who will come forth against them from Aden—and not leave a single one of them in Yemen." The king enquired, "Will Iram’s dominion there endure, or will it be cut short?" He replied, "It will indeed be cut short." The king said, "And who will cut it short?" He replied, "A prophet—a pure one—to whom the inspired revelation (al-wāḥy) will come—from on high." The king asked, "Who will this prophet spring from?" He replied, "[He will be] a man from the progeny of Ghālib b.

frequently mentioned by al-Hamdānī, was an important town and a mīkhlaf in mediaeval Islamic times, situated in northern Yemen to the northwest of Najrān. See al-Bakrī, Mu’jam mā ista’jam, II, 376; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 126.

Mīkhlaf, used in the early Islamic sources on Yemen in particular (although no longer used as an administrative term in modern Yemen), is said by the geographers to be the equivalent of kā′arah. It may have a tenacious relationship to Sabean hlf "vicinity of a town," but a form mhlf has not so far been attested in the inscriptions. See Beeston et alii, Sabaic Dictionary, 60; EP, s.v. Mīkhlaf (C. E. Bosworth).

463. Muslim lore identified Iram with the Biblical Aram, son of Shem (Gen. x. 22–23; I Chron. I. 17), and made various peoples of Arabia his descendants. When the Qur’ān, LXXXIX, 6, speaks of Iram dhāt 'imād, it is probably referring to a tribe or people, here linked with the legendary giant race of ‘Ad. See al-Hamdānī, al-Iklīl. al-fuz’ al-thāmin, 33, trans. Faris, The Antiquities of South Arabia, 29–30; Nashwān al-Ḥīmārī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns im Sams al-‘alūm, 2; EP, s.v. Iram (W. M. Watt).

Dhū Yaz’ān or Yazan was one of the Ḥīmārīte kings of the first half of the sixth century, and father of Sayf b. Dhī Yazan who secured the help of Khusraw Anūsharwān to expel the Abyssinians from Yemen; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 946ff., pp. 236ff. and n. 585 below. The component dhū in his name is the South Arabian relative pronoun d, often used to indicate clan or group affiliation, thence "the chief [of such a group]," as here. See Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 89–90; Beeston, Sabaic Grammar, §27.2. The Muslim Arabs regarded names thus compounded as so characteristic of South Arabian monarchical terminology that they used dhū, pl. adhwā', as a generic term for South Arabian rulers. See Nashwān al-Ḥīmārī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 39. 116; EP, s.v. Adhwā' [O. Löfgren].
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Fihr—son of Mālik b. al-Nāḍr—his dominion over his people shall last until the end of time.” The king said, “O Saṭīḥ, will time (al-dāḥr) have an end?” He replied, “Yes, a day on which the first generations and the last generations will be assembled—the righteous will be joyful on it—but the evildoers shall be made wretched.” The king said, “Is what you are informing us true, O Saṭīḥ?” the latter replied, “Yes, by the redness of the dying sun at evening—and the beginning of the darkness of night—and the dawn when it is complete—what I have told you is undoubtedly true.”

When Saṭīḥ had finished, Shiqq arrived, so the king summoned him. He said, “0 Shiqq, I have had a dream that has alarmed and disquieted me, so tell me about it, for if you comprehend the dream correctly, you will know correctly its interpretation,” just as he had said to Saṭīḥ. But he concealed from him what Saṭīḥ had said in order that he might see whether the two interpretations agreed or differed. Shiqq said, “Yes, you saw a skull—which came forth from the darkness—and fell upon all the land, meadows, and thickets—and devoured everything there with living breath.” When that king perceived that the words of the two soothsayers agreed with each other totally, he said to Shiqq, “O Shiqq, you have got it exactly right, so what, in your opinion, is the interpretation of it?” Shiqq replied, “I swear by the men living between the two ḥarrahs—the blacks will certainly come down on your land—and will seize custody of every tender one from your hands—and will then rule over all the land from Abyan to Najrān.”

The king exclaimed, “By your father! O Shiqq, this is indeed distressing and painful for us; but when will this take place—in my own time, or subsequently?” Shiqq answered, “Nay indeed, a stretch of time after you—then a mighty one, lofty of status, shall rescue you from it—and will make them taste the deepest abasement.” The king said, “Who is this person mighty of status?”

---

464. That is, from Quraysh, these being persons figuring in the genealogy of the tribe back to Ma’ād b. ‘Adnān. See ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 4; EIP, s.v. Kuraysh (W. M. Watt).

465. Again implying the whole length of Yemen, since Najrān lay on its northeastern fringes. See al-Bakrī, Mu’jam mā ʿista’jam, IV, 1298–99; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 266–71; EIP, s.v. Nadjrān (Irfan Shahid).
Shiqq retorted, “A youth neither base nor inadequate for what he attempts—he will issue forth from the house of Dhū Yazan.” The king said, “Will his dominion endure, or will it be cut short?” He replied, “Indeed, it will be ended by a prophet who will be sent—who will come with right and justice—among the people of religion and virtue—the dominion will remain among his people until the Day of Separation. One may ask, ‘What is the Day of Separation?’—The reply is, the day on which those near to God will be recompensed—invocations from the heavens will be made—which both the quick and the dead shall hear—and on which the people will be gathered together at the appointed place—on which there will be salvation and blessings for those who fear God.” The king said, “Is what you say true, 0 Shiqq?” The latter replied, “Yes, by the lord of heaven and earth—and the highlands and the lowlands which lie between them—what I have communicated to you is indeed the truth, in which there is no dissimulation.”

When the king had finished questioning the two men, there came into his mind that what the two of them had told him regarding the invasion of the Ethiopians was really going to take place, so he fitted out his sons and other members of his house for the journey to Iraq, together with what they needed, and wrote on their behalf to one of the kings of Persia called Shabur, son of Khurrazād, who allowed them to settle at al-Hirah. Al-Nu‘mān b. al-Mundhir, the king of al-Hirah, was a descendant of Rabī‘ah b. Naṣr; he is al-Nu‘mān b. al-Mundhir—b. al-Nu‘mān b. al-Mundhir b. ‘Amr b. ‘Adi b. Rabī‘ah b. Naṣr, that same king in the genealogy and the lore of the scholars [ahl] of Yemen.

---

466. Echoing the Qur‘ānic usage of the eschatological concept of the yāwm al-faṣl, the day of separation or distinction between those who will be saved and those who will be damned, as expounded n XXXVII, 21, etc., and especially in LXXVII, 13, 14, 38.

467. That is, the hashr or “crowding together” for the Last Judgment. See EP, s.v. Kīyāma [L. Gardet].

468. Presumably the reference is to Shābur I, since his father Ardashir I’s mother was Khurrazād. See Justi, Namenbuch, 96–97.

469. This story is in Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 9–12 – ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 15–19, trans. 4–6, and Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 418–20, and cf. Fahd, La divination arabe, 250–52. As noted in n. 457 above, the dream described thus becomes an explanation for the movement of a South Arabian group like the
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishaq, who said: When Saṭīḥ and Shiqq told that to Rabī‘ah b. Naṣr, and Rabī‘ah did with regard to his sons and other members of his house what he in fact did, the mention of all this spread among the Arabs, and they talked about it extensively until his fame and his reputation for knowledge became widely disseminated among them. Hence when the Ethiopians occupied Yemen, and the events which they had previously been talking about, including the interpretations of the two soothsayers, came to pass, al-A‘shā—that is, al-A‘shā of the Banū Qays b. Tha‘labah al-Bakri—one of the factors involving the eruption of the Ethiopians, the transfer of the royal power from Ḥimyar, and the ending of their period of dominion—and there is a cause for everything—was that Ḥassān b. Tubān As‘ad Abī Karib led an expedition with the army of Yemen, aiming at overrunning the land of the Arabs and the land of the Persians, just as the Tubba’s had been wont to do previously. But when the expedition reached

A woman with her eyelids never looked forth like with a look full of penetration, as when al-Dhi‘bī made pronouncements when he spoke in saj‘.

Saṭīḥ used only to be called al-Dhi‘bī by the Arabs because he came from the progeny of Dhi‘b b. ‘Adi. When Rabī‘ah b. Naṣr died and the royal power in Yemen became concentrated into the hands of Ḥassān b. Tubān As‘ad Abī Karib b. Malki Karib b. Zayd b. ‘Amr Dhi al-Adh‘ār, one of the factors involving the eruption of the Ethiopians, the transfer of the royal power from Ḥimyar, and the ending of their period of dominion—and there is a cause for everything—was that Ḥassān b. Tubān As‘ad Abī Karib led an expedition with the army of Yemen, aiming at overrunning the land of the Arabs and the land of the Persians, just as the Tubba’s had been wont to do previously. But when the expedition reached Lakhmid family from Yemen to Iraq.

470. The celebrated poet al-A‘shā Maymūn b. Qays, often ranked for his poetic genius with the authors of the Seven Mu‘allaqāt, came from the Qays b. Tha‘labah of Bakr b. Wā‘il (d. after 3/625), grew up in the Christian environment of al-Ḥirah and eulogized inter alios Iyās b. Qabiṣah, the appointee of the Persians to the governorship of al-Ḥirah after the deposition and death of al-Nu‘mān V b. al-Mundhir II [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1029–30, p. 359 below]. His life was much bound up with political and military events along the desert frontiers of Iraq. The verse is from his qaṣidah beginning with the formulaic hemistich Bānāt Su‘ād wa-amsā ḥablubā ḭinqa‘a, in Diwān, ed. Geyer, Gedichte von ‘Abū Baṣṭr Maimūn ibn Qais al-A‘ṣā, 74, no. 13, v. 16. See on the poet Blachère, Histoire de la litterature arabe, II, 321–25, EP, s.v. al-A‘shā, Maymūn b. Ḵays (W. Caskel).

471. Naṣhwān al-Ḥimyari, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Naṣwāns, 38, has a fanciful explanation for the princely name Dhū al-Adh‘ār.
a certain spot in the land of Iraq, Himyar and the tribes of Yemen refused to go on further with him and wanted to return to their own homeland and families. Hence they approached and spoke with one of Ḥassān’s brothers, who was with him in the army, called ‘Amr, saying, “Kill your brother Ḥassān, and we will make you king over us in his stead and you can lead us back to our homeland.” He agreed to their plan, and Ḥassān’s brother and his followers from Himyar and the tribes of Yemen agreed to kill Ḥassān, except for Dhu Ru‘ayn al-Ḥimyari, who forbade ‘Amr to do this and told him, “You are the ruling house of our kingdom; do not kill your brother and thereby dissolve the uniting bonds of our house,” or something like that. But ‘Amr rejected his words, although Dhu Ru‘ayn was a leading noble of Himyar. Hence Dhu Ru‘ayn obtained a leaf of writing material and inscribed on it:

O who would buy sleeplessness for sleep? The one who passes his nights in a calm and peaceful state is indeed fortunate. And although Himyar has acted treacherously and faithlessly, God will hold Dhu Ru‘ayn blameless.

Then he sealed the piece of writing and gave it to ‘Amr, telling him, “Keep this document by you on my behalf, for there is in it something which I desire earnestly and have need of” (i.e., for his eventual exculpation), so ‘Amr did that. When Ḥassān got news of what his brother ‘Amr, Himyar, and the tribes of Yemen had resolved upon, that is, his death, he recited to ‘Amr:

O ‘Amr, do not hasten my deathly fate, but take the royal power without using armed force.

But ‘Amr was set on killing him, and in fact did the deed. He then returned to Yemen with his accompanying army. A certain poet of Himyar recited:

When, [I pray] to God, has anyone ever seen, in previous long spans of years, the like of Ḥassān, as a slain one?

472. That Dhu Ru‘ayn were a noble family of Himyar is confirmed by Nashwān al-Ḥimyari, Die auf Sūdarabien bezüglichen Angaben Naśwāns, 46, cf. 41, apparently claiming a connection for them with the previous ruling house of Saba’.
The princelets (aqyāl) slew him out of fear lest they be kept at military service, while assuring him, “No harm, no harm!” (labābī labābī).473

Your dead one was the best of us and your living one is lord over us, while all of you are chiefs.

When ‘Amr b. Tubān As‘ad Abī Karib established himself in Yemen, he was unable to sleep and suffered permanent insomnia, according to what they assert. He found it impossible to sleep. It reduced him to a state of exhaustion, so he set about asking the physicians, and the soothsayers and diviners who work by examining physiognomy, what was the matter with him, saying, “I am deprived of sleep, and can get no rest, and insomnia has reduced me to a state of exhaustion.” One of them told him, “By God, no man has ever killed his brother or a blood relation wrongfully, as you killed your brother, without losing his sleep and incurring sleeplessness.” On being told this, ‘Amr set about killing all those members of the nobles of Ḥimyar and tribes of Yemen who had urged him to kill his brother Ḥassān, until finally he came to Dhu Ru‘ayn. When ‘Amr expressed his intention of killing him, Dhu Ru‘ayn said, “You have in your possession a document exonerating me from what you propose to do with me.” ‘Amr said, “What is this exculpating document in my possession?” He replied, “Fetch out the paper which I entrusted to you and left with you.”

The king fetched out the paper, and lo and behold, there was written on it those two verses of poetry:

O who would buy sleeplessness for sleep? The one who passes his nights in a calm and peaceful state is indeed fortunate.

---

473. Nashwân b. Sa‘īd, Die auf Südostarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwâns, 89, defines qayl as meaning "king" among the Ḥimyarites. It seems to have a fairly late usage in South Arabia in the explicit form qyl, mainly in the fifth and sixth centuries, and to bear the meaning "prince," a potentate subordinate to a malik or king, as well as the meaning of "tribal chief." See G. Ryckmans, “Le Qayl en Arabe méridionale préislamique,” 144–55; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaeen Dialect, 453–54; El2, s.v. Kayl [A. F. L. Beeston].

The word labābī/labābī is said by Ibn Ishāq, in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 19 – ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 29, trans. 13, to mean in the Ḥimyarite language là ba’s.
And although Himyar has acted treacherously and faithlessly, God will hold Dhū Ruʿayn blameless.

When ‘Amr read these two verses, Dhu Ruʿayn told him, “I forbade you to kill your brother, but you would not listen to me; so when you refused thus to listen to me, I left this paper with you as proof of my innocence in regard to you and as exoneration of me vis-à-vis you. I feared that, if you killed him, you would be afflicted as you have in fact been afflicted; and if you intend to inflict on me what I see you have inflicted on those who urged you to kill your brother, this paper will serve as a means of preserving me from your intentions.” Hence ‘Amr b. Tubān Asʿad left him alone and did not include him among the nobles of Ḥimyar whom he executed; he recognized that Dhū Ruʿayn had given him wise counsel, if only he had followed it.

‘Amr b. Tubān Asʿad recited, when he executed those guilty men of Ḥimyar and the people of Yemen who had urged him to kill his brother Ḥassān:

We purchased sleep, when tendons in the neck were drawn tight with what causes sleeplessness and knotting of sinews which will not go away.

They called out together at the time of their treacherous action, “No harm!” when the exculpation of Dhū Ruʿayn had already been expressed.

We have now executed those responsible for this betrayal, as an act of retaliation for Ibn Ruhm, which does not entail responsibility for a blood feud.

We have executed them in requital for Ḥassān b. Ruhm, for Ḥassān was the one murdered by the ones who stirred up trouble.

We have executed them, so that none of them now remains, and every eye feels refreshed at their fate.

The eyes of the lamenting women are weeping with grief for the noble women, women of the two armies.

Gentle maidens at nightfall, who are dark eyed when the upper parts of Sirius and Procyon rise.

Hence we are known by our fidelity when our lineage is traced back, and we disassociate ourselves strongly from the one who acts treacherously.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

We surpass in eminence all other people, just as pure gold is superior to silver.

We exercise royal power over all other peoples; we have the connections of nobility and power, after the two Tubba’s.

We assumed royal power after Dāwūd [David] for a lengthy period, and we made the kings of East and West our slaves.474

We wrote down in Zafār the ancient writings of glory, so that the chiefs of the two towns [al-qaryatān, sc., Mecca and al-Ṭā’if]475 might read them.

We are the ones who pursue every burden of revenge when the eloquent ones cry out, “Where, O where [is vengeance to be taken]?”

I shall quench my thirst of [the blood of] the treacherous ones, for treachery has entailed perdition for them and for me (i.e., through his brother’s murder).

I obeyed them (i.e., in their evil counsels) and was not well guided; they were seducers into evil ways, who have destroyed my noble reputation and handsome qualities.

He related: Not long afterward, ‘Amr b. Tubān died.476

Hishām b. Muḥammad related: This ‘Amr b. Tubba’ was called Mawthabān because he sprang upon (wathaba) his brother Hassān

---

474. The king and prophet Dāwūd/David (whose reign over the Children of Israel is given by al-Ṭabarī in I, 554–72 above, trans. W. M. Brinner, The History of al-Ṭabarī. III. The Children of Israel, 135–51) is presumably adduced here to connect the Tubba’s with early prophetic history. For David in Islamic lore, see EP, s.v. Dāwūd (R. Paret).

475. The royal city and capital of the Ḥimyarites appears in South Arabian inscriptions as zfr, but was known as such to classical authors from the time of Pliny the Elder [his regia Sapphar] onward. Its ruined site now lies to the southwest of Yarim in southern Yemen. It remained of some significance into early Islamic times, and al-Hamdānī describes it both in his Iklīl, 25–29, trans. Parvis, 20–26, and in his Șīfat jazirat al-ʿArab, 365, as one of the great fortresses of Yemen. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 60; Shahid, “Byzantium and South Arabia,” 29, 43–47; EI1. s.v. Zafār (J. Tkatsch).

Mecca and al-Ṭā’if are usually taken as the referents of “the two towns” in the Qur’ānic passage that this echoes, XLIII, 30/31, speaking of a rajul min al-qaryatayn ‘aẓīm, “a man of the two towns, a respected one,” but the context is somewhat obscure and the identification by no means certain. See for this question of the “two towns,” Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 114–15.

at the gap of Nu’m and killed him.477 He related: The “slope of Nu’m (furdat Nu’m)” was the desert tract of Ṭawq b. Mālik; Nu’m was the concubine of the Tubba’ Ḥassān b. As’ad.478

The narrative returns to that of Ibn Ishaq.479 He related: The affairs of Ḥimyar fell into disorder at this point, and the people became split up. A man of Ḥimyar who did not stem from the royal house of Ḥimyar, called Lakhi’āthah (?) Yanūf Dhū Shanātir, rose up against them, seized power over them, killed the choicest men of Ḥimyar, and treated with scorn the ruling families of the kingdom.480 Hence a certain man of Ḥimyar

477. Other Arabic sources give an alternative etymology for the cognomen Mawṭhabān: that rulers were thus called in the language of Ḥimyar because they “sat down” and did not engage in raiding and warfare. See Ibn Ishaq, Kitāb al-ṭijān, 298–99 (with a brief version of the preceding story), and Nashwān al-Ḥimyari, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Naswans, 113. The confusion stems from the fact that in South Arabian, the prime signification of wṭb was, as in Hebrew, “to sit down,” with mwb(n) thus meaning “seat, shrine of a god,” as opposed to Classical Arabic wāthaba “to rise, spring up,” although another range of meanings for South Arabian wṭb does exist, “to attack, assault,” to which the cognomen given here by al-Ṭabari of Mawṭhabān could be attached. See Beeston et al., Sabaic Dictionary, 165–66; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabean Dialect, 153–54. The confusion that could arise out of the two opposing senses of the root forms the basis of favorite anecdotes in the sources in which a man dies or is killed through misunderstanding the South Arabian sense of the word. See al-Hamdānī, Ikīl, 32, trans. Faris, 28; Nashwān al-Ḥimyari, loc. cit.; Robin, in L’Arabie antique de Karib’il à Mahomet. Nouvelles données sur l’histoire des Arabes grâce aux inscriptions, 108.

478. According to the geographers, the furdat Nu’m lay in Jazīrah, in the tract of land along the Euphrates, where, so Yāqūt says, Ḥassān b. Tubba’ had built a palace for this umm walad of his. See al-Bakrī, Mu’jam mā ista’jam, IV, 1211; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 251.

479. Nöldeke’s translation resumes here. He regarded the following material as still essentially legendary and fabulous, but considered that it was connected with such historical events as the persecution of the Christians of Yemen, the resultant Abyssinian occupation, and the eventual Persian conquest, hence as such worthy of translation; see his trans. 172 n. 4.

480. The episode of Lakhi’āthah or Lakhnī’āthah is somewhat mysterious. The name is variously written in the Arabic sources, e.g., Lakhni’āh in Ibn Ishaq, Sirat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 19 = ed. al-SAqqā et al., I, 30], but Nöldeke, trans. 173 n. 1, suggested the form Lakhni’āthah on the basis of its form in the South Arabian inscriptions known at that time, in which Ynṭ is likewise attested. Professor Christian Robin has suggested [personal communication] that it is a corruption of a very common personal name Lḥyā ‘ṭt, often shortened to Lḥy’t, which would mean “Aṭṭ[ār] illuminates” [after Ge’ez laḥaya “to be shining, to gleam”]; it would seem that ḥ was only feebly aspirated in Himyaritic speech, since the name passed mentioned what was destroying the fabric of Ḥimyar, rending apart its unity and getting rid of its choicest men:

Ḥimyar is massacring its own sons and expelling its own princes, and creating humiliation for itself with its own hands.

Destroying its own worldly prosperity with light-headed fantasies of its own, but what it destroyed of its religion was even greater.

In the same way, earlier generations brought down evil on themselves, through their oppression and profligacy, and then perished.\(^{481}\)

Lakhī’athah Yanūf Dhū Shanātir brought about all that for them. He was an evildoer, being allegedly a practitioner of sodomy. In addition to the killing and oppression he inflicted upon them, when he heard that a youth from the royal family had reached the age of puberty, he sent for him and ravished him in an upper chamber he had had constructed for this purpose, so that the youth could never rule after him (i.e., because of the dishonor). He would then go out from that upper chamber to his guards and those of his army who were present—these people being at a lower level—with a toothpick (ṣiwāk) he had placed in his mouth,\(^{482}\)

\(^{481}\) As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 174 n. 1, the wording of the poem, with such words in it as ḏayya’at, ḏulm, ʾissrāf, ṭakhsaru, etc., is very reminiscent of Qur’ānic phraseology and concepts.

\(^{482}\) That is, a piece of wood with the end incised for use as a toothbrush. It has been suggested that the use by the Arabs of such a primitive toothbrush or tooth-that is, in order to let them know that he had accomplished his purpose with the youth. Then he would release the youth and go forth and appear before the guards and the people, having completely disgraced the youth.

At last it was the turn of the last of the youths from that line of kings, Zur'ah Dhu Nuwās b. Tubān As'ad Abī Karīb b. Malkī Karīb b. Zayd b. 'Amr Dhi al-Adh'ār the brother of Ḥassān.483 Zur'ah had been only a small boy when his brother was killed, and had grown up into a fine and handsome youth, with an attractive appearance and intelligence. Lakhi'athah Yanūf Dhu Shanātir sent for him in order to do with him as was his wont with the princes of the royal house before him. When the messenger came to Zur'ah, he realized what Lakhi'athah intended to do, so he took a slim-bladed, sharp knife and placed it between his sandal and the sole of his foot. Then he set out to Lakhi'athah with the latter's envoy. When Lakhi'athah was alone with Zur'ah in that upper chamber of his, he locked the door on the two of them and pounced upon Zur'ah. But Dhū Nuwās leaped on him first with the knife and stabbed him with it until he had killed him. Then he cut off his head and stuck it in the window niche of that upper chamber of Lakhi'athah's, from where he was accustomed to show himself to his guards and troops. He took that toothpick of Lakhi'athah's and stuck it in the latter's mouth, and went forth to the people. They said to him, “Dhū Nuwās—was it wetness or dryness?” He an-

---

483. Unlike Lakhi'athah, Dhū Nuwās is a fully historical figure, mentioned in Byzantine sources, e.g., in the Greek of the Martyrium Arethae as Dounaas. An Arabic etymology for his name is given in the Arabic sources, e.g., Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXII, 318, and Nashwān al-Himyari, Die auf Südaranien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 106, as “the man with the dangling forelock, long hair,” but again is more likely to relate to a place name, or possibly to a deity. See on him further, nn. 486, 488, 506 below, and Nöldeke, trans. 174 n. 3, who also notes that Zur'ah is likewise a historically-attested name, since one of the local princes of Yemen who sent to the Prophet in autumn of the year 9/630 offering their acceptance of Islam, was Zur'ah Dhū Yazan, quite possibly a descendant of Dhū Nuwās; it was to him that Muḥammad sent a group of ṣadaqah collectors headed by Mu‘ād b. Jabal. See Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 955-57 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., IV, 235-36, tr. 642-44.
swered, “Ask n.kh.mās—s.t.r.t.bān Dhū Nuwās—s.t.r.t.bān Dhū Nuwās—[he is] unharmed (lā ba’s).” They went off to look when he called to them in these terms, and lo, there was the severed head of Lakhī’atḥah Yanūf Dhū Shanāṭir in the window niche, with his toothpick in his mouth, which Dhū Nuwās had jammed there! Ḥīmyar and the guards went off after Dhū Nuwās until they caught up with him and told him, “The only fitting person to rule over us is yourself, since you have rid us of this abominable fellow.” They therefore made him king, and Ḥīmyar and the tribes of Yemen rallied round him.485 He was the last of the kings of Ḥīmyar. He became a convert to Judaism (tahaw-wada[,] and the Ḥīmyarites followed him in this path. He adopted the name of Yūsuf (i.e., Joseph) and reigned for a considerable time.486

484. According to Ibn Ḥishām’s gloss, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 20 – ed. al–Saqqā et al., I, 31, tr. 14, n.khmās was a Ḥīmyarī word for “head.” The rest of this puzzling saying clearly has an obscene reference, as the word seemingly figuring in it—ist, “anus”—implies, explicit in Abū al-Faraj al-İsfahānī, Aghānī3, xxii, 319.
486. The questions of the date of the appearance of Judaism in Yemen, the extent of that faith’s spread from the ruler and nobles downward to the generality of the population, and the nature and quality of that Judaism, have excited much discussion.

There seems no reason to doubt the reports (al-Ṭabarī, I, 892, 902, 905, pp. 145, 165–66, 170–71 above: one of Ibn Ḥishāq’s informants for these seems to have been Abū Mālik b. Tha’labah b. Abī Mālik al-Quraẓi, whose grandfather had been a Jewish client of Kindah and who had migrated from Yemen to Yathrib; see M. Lecker, “Abū Mālik ‘Abdallāh b. Sām of Kinda, a Jewish convert to Islam,” 280–82) that Abū Karib As‘ad accepted the Jewish faith in some form or other when he was at Yathrib in the first half of the fifth century and that the faith was already known at the Ḥīmyarite court in the time of his father Malkī Karib, i.e., the end of the fourth century, when paganism was abandoned for monotheism. The implantation of a genuine Judaism there around that time would be parallel to the contemporaneous consolidation of the Christian community at Najrān, for which see n. 487 below. See Smith, “Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 462–63; J. Ryckmans, “Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique,” 417–19. 426–28, 447; Lecker, “The Conversion of Ḥīmyar to Judaism and the Jewish Banū Ḥadl of Medina,” 129–36.

There is epigraphic evidence for the existence of adherents of Judaism in Yemen proper during the later fifth century, in that the Bayt al-Ashwal I inscription was erected at Za‘far by a man called Yhwd‘ Yk/Yehūdā Yakkuf (for Yankuf), clearly a native South Arabian, who invokes “the Lord of Heaven and Earth” and “His
There were in Najran remnants of people who adhered to the religion of 'Isa (Jesus), followers of the Gospel, virtuous and upright. They had a head, of this same faith, called 'Abdallah b. al-Thamir. The place where that faith originally took root was Najran, which at that time was in the center of the land of the Arabs; its people, like all the rest of the Arabs, were (originally) idol worshipers. At that point, a man called Faymiyun, from the rem-

Arabic cultural and linguistic sector of the Arabian Peninsula rather than the Sabaean-Himyarite one, on the basis of the Arabic names of the Martyrs of Najran and the existence there in the sixth century of a school of Arabic poets, but this suggestion is rejected by such experts on South Arabian languages as W. W. Möller.

The advent of Christianity to Najran was part of a general percolation of monistic religions, specifically Judaism and Christianity, into the Arabian Peninsula (for Judaism in western and southern Arabia, see n. 486 above, and for Judaism at Najran specifically, where the community seems to have been an old, established one, see Lecker, "Judaism among Kinda and the Ridda of Kinda," 635–36). Already in the mid-fourth century, the king of Himyar had received a diplomatic mission sent by the Byzantine emperor Constantius II (r. 337–61) under Theophilus "the Indian" (who was actually from the island of Socotra, the whole region of South Arabia and the Gulf of Aden shores being often referred to vaguely in Byzantine sources as "India"), an Arian in faith like his master, and the king had undertaken to build three churches within his dominions. Later in that same century, Abi Karib As'ad and others of his family adopted a monistic faith that involved some form of Judaism (see n. 486 above). There may well have been some political factors at work here, since the Abyssinian kingdom of Axum was at this time adopting Christianity and the faith was also spreading among the Arabs of the northern and eastern fringes of the Peninsula. The Himyarite rulers may have wished to counter a possible threat of intervention on religious grounds from outside—intervention which was, indeed, to materialize when the power of the Himyarite monarchy went into decline in the early sixth century. J. Ryckmans opined that both Nestorianism and Monophysitism were represented within the Najran Christian community, but that the former was likely to have been more favorably regarded by the Jewish or Judaizing Himyarite kings of the eighty years or so before the Abyssinian intervention in favor of Monophysitism, and that the celebrated persecutions at Najran were essentially of the Monophysites there, with the Nestorians merely looking on, if not actively encouraging the Himyarite rulers; see his "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," 448, 450–52. Through Abyssinian enthusiasm for Monophysitism, and a distinct Byzantine preference for it over Nestorianism (see n. 511 below), Najran itself became the focus in the sixth century for something like an Arabian national church, Monophysite in theology. From the time of the Byzantine emperor Anastasius I (r. 491–518), the Himyarites had a bishop of their own, probably a Syrian and Monophysite in theology, called Silvanus, and we know the names of two Monophysite bishops, both named Paul, consecrated for Najran itself around this time (see below). During the early Islamic period, despite the deportations of Christians from Najran to Iraq by the second caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the faith was to survive there (as also in the island of Socotra, in the Gulf of Aden) into mediaeval Islamic times. The Nestorian Church in Iraq had contacts with Christians in southwestern Arabia for some three centuries after the advent of Islam: the Patriarch Timothy ordained a bishop for Yemen and Ṣanʿī in c. 800, and John IV answered questions from a priest "of the people of Yemen" in c. 900. See Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 230; Beaucamp and Robin, "Le Christianisme dans la péninsule arabique d'après l'épigraphie et l'archéologie," 56–57; BP, s.v. Nadjrân (Irfan Shahid).

But before the consolidation of Christianity in Najran under Byzantine and Abyssinian influence came about, the desire of the Himyarite ruling strata to nants of the adherents of that faith had come among them; he summoned them to his religion and they adopted it.

Hishâm related: [He was] Zur'ah Dhu Nuwas, but when he became a convert to Judaism, he assumed the name of Yusuf.488 It preserve their national identity and culture between the two powerful Christian realms of Byzantium and Abyssinia, had inevitably entailed a growing hostility toward the indigenous Monophysite Christian community, even if for political rather than strictly religious reasons. There was persecution under Sharahbi'il Yakuf (known to have been reigning in 472), when we know from an Ethiopic hagiographical work that the missionary Azqir (whose name Ryckmans linked, through deformed transcriptions, with the Yazdin of a Persian romance centered round one of the Persian Christian martyrs; Beeston suggested a possible connection with Arabic al-Dhakîr “the famed, reputed one”) was killed, possibly for proselytizing but certainly with some sort of Jewish involvement in the deed (see Ryckmans, op. cit., 441-43; Beeston, “The Martyrdom of Azqir,” 5-10; Rubin, “Byzantium, and Southern Arabia—the Policy of Anastasius,” 387-88); and Paul, the first bishop of Najran, was martyred at the Himyarite capital Zafâr, stoned by the Jews there, at an unknown date before 521 but possibly before 504, as is known from the Syriac martyrological literature. Intervention by Abyssinia was not long in coming, and it seems that Yusuf As'âr Dhu Nuwâs's predecessor Ma'dî Karib Ya'fur was placed on the throne of Himyar by the Abyssinians in late 518 or early 519, as part of a direct extension of Abyssinian influence into Yemen, involving even a permanent mission in Zafâr, where (judging from their names) Abyssinian representatives built a palace for themselves during the reign of Ma'dî Karib Ya'fur's predecessor Marthad 'ilan Yanûf. The stage was thus set for the culmination of what had probably been a series of persecutions of the Christians of Najran, the most notorious being that in the proto-nationalist, pro-Jewish reaction, which intensified under Yusuf As'âr Dhu Nuwâs; see the following note. On the vestiges Arabian Christianity has left in the epigraphy and archaeology of the peninsula, see Beaucamp and Robin, op. cit., 45-61; on the position of Christianity in the politics and diplomacy of southwestern Arabia at this time, Robin, “Le royaume hujride,” 699-702; and on the faith there in general, the references in the following note.

Nöldeke, trans. 177 n. 3, thought that Faymiyûn was most likely a shortened form of Euphemion, so that this Greek name would point to a man coming from the Byzantine lands. But since his time there has been further investigation of the origins of this story of the introduction of Christianity to Najran, in particular, by A. Moberg. Moberg traced the story of the Arabic sources, with its theme of the wandering ascetic from Syria, to Persian Christian romantic legends of Yazdîn-Pethion, involving the martyrdom in Persia in 447 of Pethion, whose name yielded the Arabic form Faymiyûn. See the discussion of his views in J. Ryckmans, op. cit., 441-42.

The story of 'Abdallah b. al-Thâmir is given in al-Ṭabarî, I, 923-25, pp. 200-202 below.

488. The actual name of Dhu Nuwâs (this being a nickname or cognomen, see n. 483 above), of the family of Yaz'an, emerges from an inscription dating from the month of Dhû Madhra'an 633 of the Himyarite era/June–July 523. His name is given in the inscription as Yusuf/Yûsûf (replacing Yanûf ?) As'âr Yath'âr, with the title “king of all the tribes, 's2bâ',” a much more modest one than the usual
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

was he who had the trench (al-ukhdūd) dug out at Najrān and killed the Christians.489

There related to us Ibn Ḫumayd—Salāmah—Muḥammad b. Īshāq—al-Muḥīrāh b. Abī Labīd, a freedman of al-Akhnas—Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yāmānī,490 who related to them that the grandiloquent ones of the Ḥimyarite kings, such as "king of Saba’, Dhū Raydān, Ḥaḍramawt, and Yāmānī, together with the Arabs of the Tiḥāmāt and the Tiḥāmāt" (see nn. 314, 417 above) and one which seems to reflect the fact that, as an usurper, his rule was illegitimate.

Dhū Nuwāṣ replaced the last Tubba’ ruler Ma’di Karib Ya’fur between June 521 and June 522, and was defeated by the Abyssinians soon after Pentecost 525, killing himself shortly afterward (see al-Ṭabārī, I, 927–28, p. 207 below). Whatever the nature of his commitment to Judaism (see n. 486 above)—and Shahid has suggested that he may well have started off as a Christian and as the designated successor of Ma’di Karib (but see above)—he embarked in 523 on his campaign to eliminate the Abyssinians and the indigenous Christians of southwestern Arabia. The eight hundred-strong Abyssinian community in Zafr was put to death and the Abyssinian-held fortresses in Shamir taken. Tiḥāmāt was conquered, and Najrān compelled to give hostages and to endure a blockade. Then in November of that same year 523, Najrān was attacked and occupied, its Christian population massacred, the churches burned down, and Greek and Abyssinian traders there killed. See R. Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 33–63; Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 459–60; G. Ryckmans, "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique,” 413–53; Altheim and Stehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 373–85; idem, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 442–43; Shahid, The Martyrs of Najrān. New Documents, 266–68; Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 297–99; Müller, "Survey of the History of the Arabian Peninsula,” 129; Robin, in op. cit., 151–52; E2, s.vv. Dhū Nuwāṣ [M. R. Al-Assouad], Mathāmīna [CHR. ROBIN], n. 506 below.

The chronology adopted here for these events, including the actual martyrdoms at Najrān and the happenings following on from them, is that put forward, after a very thorough sifting of the evidence (from Byzantine Greek and Syriac sources and from contemporary South Arabian inscriptions) by François de Blois, that the martyrdoms took place at the traditional date of 523 and not in 518, as argued by, e.g., Rubin and Shahid. See de Blois, "The Date of the "Martyrs of Naghrān,“ 110–27.

489. Traditional Qur’ānic exegesis regarded the asḥāb al-ukhdūd, "companions of the trench," of LXXXV, 4–8, as being the Christian martyrs of Najrān, praised for their steadfastness in the face of immolation or, occasionally, connected with the three men in Nebuchadnezzar’s fiery furnace of Daniel, iii. 13ff. Joseph Halévy, on his pioneer expedition into Yemen in 1869–70 sponsored by the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, found that the Najrān of that time was called Madinat al-Khudūd (< ukhdūd); see his “Rapport sur une mission archéologique dans le Yémén,” 37–40. The connection with the martyrs of Najrān was upheld by older generations of Western scholars, e.g., Nöldeke, in his Geschichte des Qurāns, I, 97 n. 3, and [originally] Richard Bell in his The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 38, 68. But it is now generally recognized as being not a specifically historical reference but, rather, an eschatological one, the "companions of the trench" being unbelievers destined for Hell Fire because of what they had done to implantation of that religion (sc., Christianity) in Najrān arose from the fact that there was a man from the remnants of the followers of the faith of ʿĪsā b. Maryam called Faymiyūn,—a pious man, a zealous fighter for the faith and an ascetic, one whose prayers were answered by God.491 He used to wander forth, staying in villages. As soon as he became known in one village (sc., as a holy man and wonder worker), he would leave it for another village where he was not known. He lived entirely off what his own hand gained; he was a builder, who worked with mud brick. He used to keep Sunday holy, and when this day came round would do no work but would go out into a desert place and pray and worship there until it was evening. He was once in one of the villages of Syria, performing those rites of his away from human gaze, when a local man called Ṣāliḥ realized what sort of an exalted religious state Faymiyūn had attained and felt a love for him such as he had never felt for anything previously.492 He followed Faymiyūn around wherever he went, unperceived by Faymiyūn, until on one occasion Faymiyūn went forth into the desert on Sunday, as was his custom, followed by Ṣāliḥ, unbeknown to Faymiyūn. Ṣāliḥ sat down in a place where he could see the believers [v. 7]. See Bell, ed. Bosworth and M. E. J. Richardson, A Commentary on the Qurʾān, II, 517; EP, s.v. Aṣḥāb al-ukhḍūd [R. Paret].

490. The Tābīʿ or Successor ʿAbdulāh Wahb b. Munabbih [b. ca. 34/654–55, d. 110/728 or 114/732] was one of the most knowledgeable of Umayyad period historians, especially regarding the “Stories of the Prophets” and regarding South Arabian lore, having been himself born, of Persian stock, at Dhimār to the north of Ṣanʿāʾ. He seems to have been able to draw on both Jewish and Christian traditions (in the latter case, notably for the story of the events here at Najrān), it is regrettable that his Kitāb al-mulūk al-mutawwaḥah min Ḥimyar wa-akhbārihim wa-qīṣāsih wa-qubūrihim wa-ashʿārihim is only known through later citations, including extensively in the first part of Ibn Hishām’s Kitāb al-tāj, which depends heavily on Wahb. See Krenkow, “The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore,” 56ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 305–307; EP, s.v. Wahb b. Munabbih [R. G. Khoury].

491. Nöldeke, trans. 177 n. 3, regarded the following tale of Faymiyūn and Ṣāliḥ, and its sequel, the tale of ʿAbdulāh b. al-Thāmir, as nothing but pious legend, but Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 294–95, thought that they should not be discounted as complete inventions but should be considered as reflections of later Islamic attempts to illuminate the background of the Prophet’s life and to elucidate supposed Qurʾānic references to events in Najrān (but see on these references, n. 489 above).

492. The name Ṣāliḥ has connotations of “piety, God-fearingness,” and also evokes the name of the Qurʾānic native Arabian prophet sent to warn Thamūd. As a personal name, it seems to be very rare in pre-Islamic usage. See EP, s.v. Ṣāliḥ [A. Rippin].
Faymiyun, but in a place concealed from Faymiyun, not wishing the latter to know where he was. Faymiyun started praying, but while he was preoccupied with this, a tinnin, a serpent with seven heads, slid up to him. On seeing it, Faymiyun called down a curse on it, and it died. Šāliḥ saw the tinnin, but did not know what had happened to it, and feared for Faymiyun’s safety. Hence he was overcome with concern for him and cried out, “O Faymiyun, a tinnin has just come up to you!” But Faymiyun paid no attention to him and kept on with his worship and prayers until he had completed them. Evening having come on, he returned, knowing that he had been recognized; Šāliḥ likewise knew that Faymiyun had seen where he was. Šāliḥ addressed him, saying, “O Faymiyun, God knows that I have never loved anything as much as I love you; I want to accompany you and be with you wherever you may go.” Faymiyun replied, “As you wish. You see what my work is, but if you believe that you are strong enough to undertake it yourself, well and good.” Šāliḥ accordingly remained with him closely, but the people of the village were on the verge of discovering Faymiyun’s real nature. For when one of God’s servants with some disease suddenly crossed his path, Faymiyun prayed for him, and he was cured; but when he was summoned to a sick person, he refused to go. Now one of the people of that village had a son who had some affliction (darir), and he asked about Faymiyun’s conduct. He was told that he never came when expressly summoned but that he was a man who did building work for people in return for his hire. So the man went along to that son of his, and put him in his room and threw a garment over him. Then he went to Faymiyun and asked him, “O Faymiyun, I want some building work done in my house, so come back with me and have a look at it, so that I can discuss conditions with you.” Faymiyun went back with him and entered the room. He next said, “What do you want done in your house?” The man replied, “So-and-so,” and whisked away the garment from of the lad, saying, “O Faymiyun, one of God’s servants has been afflicted as you can see; so pray to God for him!” Faymiyun exclaimed

493. The tinnin appears as a seven-headed dragon in Jewish Haggadic lore, taken over subsequently into the Islamic ḥadīth stories; see, e.g., W. M. Thackston Jr., The Tales of the Prophets of al-Kisa’i, Boston 1978, 201.

494. Thus in the context, rather than “blind.”
when he saw the boy, "O God, Your enemy has entered into the sound health which You bestowed on one of your servants in order to destroy it, so cure him, restore him to health and protect him from the Devil!" The boy thereupon got up and was completely free of any defect.

Faymiyun now realized that he was recognized, so departed from the village, with Šāliḥ accompanying him. On one occasion, he was walking somewhere in Syria and passed by a large tree. A man called down to him from the tree, saying, "Is that Faymiyun?" The latter replied, "Yes." The man said, "I have been continuously awaiting you and have kept saying, 'When is he coming?' until I heard your voice and knew that you were its owner. Don't go away until you have prayed over my grave, for I am now at the point of death." He related: He did die at that moment, and Faymiyun prayed over him and buried him. Then he departed, accompanied by Šāliḥ, until the two of them set foot in part of the land of the Arabs. But the Arabs swept down on them, and a caravan of some Arab group snatched them up, carried them off, and finally sold them in Najran.

At that period, the people of Najran followed the religion of the Arabs, worshiping a lofty date palm in their midst. Every year they had a festival, when they hung on that tree every fine garment they could find and also women's ornaments. Then they went forth and devoted themselves to worship of it for the whole day. One of the nobles of Najran purchased Faymiyun, and another man purchased Šāliḥ. Now one night Faymiyun stood up in a hut (bayt) his master had allotted to him, praying, when the whole hut

---

495. The man in the tree was presumably a dendrite, a tree-dwelling ascetic, with a way of life analogous to that of a stylete or pillar dweller.

496. The worship of sacred trees was a standard feature of ancient Semitic religion, attested among the Canaanites, Phoenicians, etc. In Arabia, as well as this date palm at Najran, there was the acacia tree (samurah) at al-Nakhlah, between Mecca and al-Tā'if, embodiment of the goddess al-'Uzza, and the great tree at Ḫunayn called dhāt anwāt "[tree] on which date baskets, etc., are hung," to which the people of pre-Islamic Mecca used to resort and bring gifts. See Robertson Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. First Series. The Fundamental Institutions, 185ff; J. Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums5, 36, 104–105; H. Lammens, Le berceau de l'Islam, 7–72; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 79–80; Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'hégire, 31–32, 58. Noldeke, trans. 181 n. 1, attributed the hanging of women's ornaments on the tree to the fact that the word for date palm, nakhlah, is of feminine gender in Arabic.
was filled with light as if from a lamp, until it was completely illuminated but without the presence of any lamp. Faymiyun's master saw this, and the light filled him with wonder. He asked Faymiyun about his religion, and the latter told him about it. Faymiyun explained to him: "You people are completely in error; this date palm can neither harm nor benefit, and if I were to invoke against it the One whom I worship, He would destroy it. He is God, the One, without any partner." He related: His master told him, "Do that, and if you can bring that to pass, we will embrace your religion and abandon the one we used to hold." He related: Faymiyun arose, purified himself, prayed two rak'ahs, and then invoked God's curse on the date palm. God sent a wind that tore it up from its roots and cast it down. At that, the people of Najran followed Faymiyun and adopted his religion. He instructed them in the law (sharī'ah) of the faith of 'Isa b. Maryam. But after that, various innovations (ahdāth) came into their faith, as into that of their coreligionists in every land. From this center, the Christianity of Najran spread in the land of the Arabs—all this being the report of Wahb b. Munabbih concerning the people of Najran.

There related to us Humayd—Salamah, who said: There related to us Muhammad b. Ishāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād, a freedman of the Banū Hashim—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurāzī. He said: There related to us also Muḥammad b. Ishāq from a man of the people of 497. Anticipating, in its Qur'ānic phraseology regarding God's unity, tawḥīd, Muḥammad's denunciation, in his later years at Mecca, of the "Daughters of Allāh," the three pagan goddesses worshiped by Quraysh, as having no spiritual efficacy, either positive or negative. See on this last episode, involving the so-called Satanic verses, Watt, Muḥammad at Mecca, 100–109.

498. Looking forward to the rak'ah, the act of bowing and bending, which forms part of the Muslim ṣalāt.

499 This seems to be the sense here of aḥdāth, rather than the general one of "events, happenings."

500. This tale, of no direct relevance to the drama of political and military events in South Arabia that swirled around such figures as Dhū Nuwās and Abrahah, is given in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstefeld, 20–22 – ed. al-Sagga et al., I, 32–35, tr. 14–16.

501 Muḥammad b. Ka'b [d. 118/736], descended from the Medinan Jewish clan of Qurayzah, was a Successor famed both as an early Qur'ān commentator and as a retailer of akhbār, historical traditions, and in this last utilized by Ibn Ishāq. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 32.
Najrān: The people of Najrān were polytheists who worshiped idols. In one of their villages near Najrān—Najrān being the major urban center there, in which the people of that region used to come together—there was a sorcerer who used to teach magic to the Najrān youths. When Faymiyūn took up residence in Najrān [He related: They did not call him by the name which Wahb b. Munabbih gives him, but they simply said "a man took up residence there"], he put up a tent between Najrān and that village where the sorcerer lived. The people of Najrān began to send their boys to that sorcerer, who then taught them magic. Hence al-Thāmīr sent his son ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmīr, together with the other youths of the people of Najrān. When ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmīr passed by the man in the tent, he was astonished by what he saw of the man’s praying and acts of devotion, and began to sit with him and listen to him, until he surrendered himself to God (aslama), acknowledged God’s unity, and worshiped Him. He set about asking the man about the Greatest Name (of God), but although the man knew it, he concealed it from him with the words, “O my nephew, you will not be able to bear it; I fear you are too weak for it.”

502 He therefore refused to tell him. Meanwhile, al-Thāmīr, the father of ʿAbdallāh, had no idea that his son ʿAbdallāh was not going along [regularly] to the sorcerer just as the other youths were doing. When ʿAbdallāh saw that his master had kept the knowledge [of God’s Greatest Name] from him and was afraid for his weakness, he took a number of arrows and gathered them together.503 Every name of God that he knew he wrote on an arrow, every name on a single arrow. When he had counted all the names, he lit a fire for this special purpose and began to throw the arrows on it one by one, until he finally reached the arrow with the Greatest Name of God [on it]. He threw it on the fire, but it immediately sprang out completely undamaged. He went up to it and grasped it, and then went to his master and informed him that he had now come to know the name his master had concealed from him. His master questioned him about it, and the youth replied that it was such-and-such. His master said, "How did you come to know it?" The boy told him how he had set about discovering it. He related: He then said, "O my nephew, you have got it correctly, but keep it to yourself—yet I don't think you actually will."

502. This is what became the Islamic equivalent of the Jewish name of God, the tetragrammaton yhwh, ha-shem ha-maforāsh, known only to the High Priest, who was only allowed to pronounce it once a year. In Islam, the secret name of God becomes a word of power, whose possessor can wreak with it mighty, supernatural deeds. See Nöldeke, trans. 183 n. 1.

503 Arrows were used for oracular and divinatory purposes in some sectors at least of ancient Semitic religion, as in Ezek. xxi. 21, where the king of Babylon consults his divining arrows. In Qur’ān, V, 4/3, al-istiqsām bi-al-azlām, “division of a sacrificial offering by means of arrows,” which is said to have been practiced in the Ka’bah of pre-Islamic times before the image of the god Hubal (see Ibn al-Kalbi, Kitāb al-asnām, 17, tr. Klinke-Rosenberger, 44 and 114–15 n. 256, tr. Faris 23–24; al-Ṭabarī, I, 1075–78), is denounced as a relic of paganism. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 181–82; EI², s.v. Istiqsām [T. Fahd].

Thereafter, whenever `Abdallah b. al-Thāmir came to Najrān and met any sick person there he would invariably say, "O servant of God, will you confess the unity of God and adopt my religion, so that [if you do], I may invoke the blessing of God and He will cure you of your affliction?" The sick person would assent. `Abdallāh would thereupon proclaim God's unity, submit himself to God, and pray to Him, so that the man was then healed. In the end, there was no sick or maimed person left in Najrān who did not come to him and then followed him in his faith; `Abdallāh invoked God's blessing on the sick person and he was healed. Ultimately, the news of his activity reached the king of Najrān. He sent for `Abdallah and accused him: "You have corrupted the people of my town and have set yourself against my religion and that of my forefathers; I shall inflict exemplary punishment on you!" `Abdallāh replied, "You have no power to do that." The king set about dispatching him to a high mountain, from whose summit he was hurled down; but he fell to the ground totally unhurt. Next, the king had him consigned to some waters at Najrān, [deep] stretches of water out of which nothing had ever emerged alive. He was thrown into them, but again came out unharmed.

Having thus triumphed over the king, `Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir told him, "By God, you will never be able to kill me until you confess the unity of God and believe in my own system of belief; but if you do that, you will be given power over me and will be able 504 A total formalized in later Muslim piety as the "Ninety-nine Most Beautiful Names" of God. See EP, s.v. al-Asmāʿ al-ḥusnā (L. Gardet).

---

to kill me." That king thereupon confessed the unity of God and bore witness to the creed of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir. He then struck him with a staff he had in his hand, striking his head with a blow of only moderate violence, thereby killing him; but the king himself then dropped dead on the spot. The people of Najrān accepted the faith of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir en masse, and henceforth held fast to the gospel and the law that Jesus son of Mary had brought. Subsequently, they were affected by the events that also affected their coreligionists. This was the origin of Christianity at Najrān. 505

Such is the report of Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī and another scholar of Najrān knowledgeable about that event; but God is the most knowledgeable [about all this].

He (i.e., Ibn Ishaq) related: Dhū Nuwās marched against them with his forces of the Ḥimyarites and the tribes of Yemen. He gathered the people of Najrān together, and summoned them to the Jewish faith, offering them the choice between that and being killed. They chose being killed, so he dug out for them the trench (al-ukhdūd). He burnt some of them with fire, slew some violently with the sword, and mutilated them savagely until he had killed nearly twenty thousand of them. 506 Out of them there es-

505. There was pointed out to Halevy, at the ruins of the old town of Najrān, a mosque built at the tomb of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāmir (sic), described to him as the first Muslim apostle to the district, although scholars in Najrān attributed the tomb to a saint of pre-Islamic times; see his "Rapport sur une mission archéologique dans le Yémen," 39–40. Today, there is a police post in the Wādī Najrān named Qaṣr 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāmir after the nearby supposed tomb of the wāli of this name, see Beaucamp and Robin, "Le Christianisme dans la péninsule arabique d'après l'épigraphie et l'archéologie," 53–54 and n. 49.

506. Ibn Ishaq has more detail here than Ibn al-Kalbī on the actual martyrdom of the Christians. Although the Syriac Book of the Himyarites, composed in the second quarter of the sixth century and therefore very close to the time in question, i.e., 523, mentions nothing about the Christians being put in a pit, the recently discovered Syriac "new" letter of Simeon of Beth Aršām specifically says that two thousand Christians were immolated when their church was burned. See Shahid's edition, translation, and study, The Martyrs of Najrān. New Documents.

Dhū Nuwās's policy here may not have been one that he conceived and pursued entirely of his own accord, in isolation from outside considerations, given the possible background of his conversion to some form of Judaism (see n. 486 above). That it was aimed at countering an extension of Christian Abyssinan influence in Yemen is clear, but Dhū Nuwās may have looked for support in another quarter of Arabia. M. J. Kister has suggested, with impressive documentation, that the
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak 203
caped only one man, called Daws Dhū Tha'labān, on one of his horses, who traveled through the sands until he threw his pursuers off.507

He related: I have heard a certain man from the people of Yemen say that the man who escaped from them was a man of Najrān called Jabbār (var. Ḥayyān) b. Fayḍ. He related: In my view, the more authentic of the two reports is that of the man who narrated to me that it was Daws Dhū Tha'labān.

Dhū Nuwās returned with his forces to Ṣan‘ā’ in the land of Yemen.508 Concerning Dhū Nuwās and his troops, there narrated Lakhmid king of al-Ḥirah al-Mundhir III (on whom see nn. 362, 409 above) exerted a measure of control across Najd as far as Medina, with the backing of his suzerains the Sāsānīds, for whom an 'amil collected taxes in Medina at this time; see his “Al-Ḥira. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia,” 144–49. From this possibility of an alliance between the pagan Lakhmid rulers with the Jewish tribes in Medina, who were still dominant over the local Arabs of the Yathrib oasis during the first half of the sixth century, Shahīd and Altheim and Stiehl have gone on to suggest that Dhū Nuwās, in his anti-Abyssinian and anti-Christian policies at Najrān and in Yemen, looked to al-Mundhir for at least moral and perhaps diplomatic backing, given the apparent connection of the later Ḥimyarite kings' Jewish tendencies or sympathies with Medina (cf. the tale, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 901–905, pp. 164–70 above, of Tubān As‘ad Abū Karīb’s espousal of Judaism when passing through Medina, and also n. 486 above). Furthermore, Ḥamza al-Īṣāfānī, Ta’rikh, 113, states that “Dhū Nuwās halted at Yathrib when once he was passing through, and was favorably impressed by the Jewish faith. Hence he adopted it for himself, and the Jews of Yathrib incited him to attack Najrān and to inflict trials and tribulations on the Christians there.” Al-Mundhir, for his part, would have welcomed an opportunity to counteract Abyssinian power over southwestern Arabia. See Nöldeke, trans. 183 n. 1; Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 36–39; Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 359–61; eisdem, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 440–41; Shahīd, The Martyrs of Najrān, 266–68; Tringham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 297; Rubin, “Byzantium and Southern Arabia—the Policy of Anastasius,” 401–402.

However, by the time the Abyssinians appeared in Yemen in 525 in order to avenge the Martyrs of Najrān and the Abyssinians slain in southwestern Arabia, al-Mundhir was in no position to offer any military help, being hard pressed by his rivals of Kindah and being shortly afterward ejected, albeit temporarily, from his own capital al-Ḥirah by the Kindī al-Ḥārith b. ‘Amr (see n. 362 above).

507. Dhū Tha'labān was the name of one of the eight great noble families of Ḥimyar, influential either during the period of independent Ḥimyarite royal power or during that of Abyssinian and then Persian domination over southwestern Arabia that followed the extinction of the Ḥimyarite ruling dynasty, Tha’lab being apparently a tribal name. Epigraphic evidence does support the fact that the Dhū Tha'labān came from the Najrān area. See Nöldeke, trans. 186 n. 1; Ep, s.v. al-Mathāmīna (Chr. Robin).

508. Ṣan‘ā’ emerges into prominence only in the inscriptions of the third cento us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Ishaq, who said: God sent down to His Messenger the words “Slain were the Men of the Trench, with the fire abounding in fuel,” to His words “... and God, the Mighty, the Praiseworthy.” It is said that ‘Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir, their leader and imām, was among those whom Dhū Nuwās killed, but it is also said that ‘Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir was killed before that event, killed by a previous ruler. He was the founder of that faith [at Najrān], and Dhū Nuwās only slew adherents of ‘Abdallāh’s religion who came after him.

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he says that the royal power in Yemen was handed down continuously, with no one venturing to contest it until the Abyssinians (al-Habashah) seized control of their land in the time of Anūsharwān. He related: The reason for their conquest was that Dhū Nuwās the Himyarite exercised royal power in Yemen at that time, and he was an adherent of the Jewish faith. There came to him a Jew called Daws from the people of Najrān, who told him that the people of Najrān had unjustly slain his two sons; he now sought Dhū Nuwās’s help against them. The people of Najrān were Christians. Dhū Nuwās was a fervent partisan of the Jewish faith, so he led an expedition against the people of Najrān, killing large numbers of them. A man from the people of Najrān fled and in due course came to the King of Abyssinia. He informed the king of what the Yemenis had committed and gave him a copy of the Gospels partly burned by the fire. The King of Abyssinia said to him: "I have plenty of men, but no ships [to transport them]; but I will write to Qaysar [i.e., the Byzantine Emperor] asking him to send me ships for transporting the soldiers." Hence he wrote to Qaysar about this matter, enclosing the [partly] burned copy of the Gospels, and Qaysar dispatched a large number of ships.511

...
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

511. Refugees from Najrān and the other places in Yemen and Ḥḍrāmawt where there had been persecutions (the Syriac Book of the Himyarites mentions that these occurred in five towns, Zafār, Najrān, "the town of Ḥḍrāmawt," Mārib, and [Hajjārān, see Shahid, "Byzantium in South Arabia," 38] probably managed to escape to Abyssinia and possibly to Byzantine territory at the head of the Red Sea. At all events, the news speedily reached the Christian kingdoms of Axum and Byzantium, and the sufferings of the Najrānites entered their martyrologies (the Ethiopian Church adopted into its calendar the commemoration of the samdítāta Neğrān, "witnesses of Najrān," on 26 November; see H. M. Hyatt, The Church of Abyssinia, 32). The martyrdoms at Najrān involved essentially, as noted in n. 487 above, the local Monophysites, and the Church of Abyssinia was also Monophysite. Byzantium was Melkite, and persecuted Monophysites within the empire’s boundaries, but southwestern Arabia was sufficiently far from the imperial heartlands for theological niceties not to count in the face of a Judaizing ruler and his persecution of Christians. Justin halted his own persecution of the Monophysites within his dominions, and utilized the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria as his intermediary with the Abyssinian Najashi or Negus in Axum. Eventually, a fleet of some sixty merchant ships commandeered by the Byzantine authorities set out from Adulis, the port of Axum on what is now the Eritrean coast under the leadership of the king in Axum, Kālēb, who had the regnal name of Ėlla Ašbēḥa (rendered by Procopius, The Persian War, I.xx.1–13, as Hēlēsthaios for Hēllēsthaios; in a South Arabian inscription ṭṣbh). This was probably in the spring or summer of 525. Kālēb’s activities as the restorer of Christianity in South Arabia were to earn him great renown within the church. After disposing of Dhū Nuwās, Ėlla Ašbēḥa seems to have erected a victory inscription in Ge’ez, one which is unfortunately only fragmentarily legible, at Mārib. He very probably engaged in a campaign of revenge, slaughtering great numbers of Himyarites and destroying their idols and temples. He certainly embarked upon an extensive program of church building in southwestern Arabia, details of which are given in the Greek—possibly with a Syriac Vorlage—hagiographical Vita Sancti Gregentii, whose extensive information here has been made the subject of a close study by Irfan Shahid. See Nöldeke, trans. 188 n. 1; Smith, “Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 454–55; Murad Kamil, “An Ethiopian Inscription found at
The narrative returns to that of Ibn Ishāq. There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Ishāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī BAKR b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm, who related that there was a man from the people of Najrān in the time of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb\(^{512}\) who dug up one of the ruined sites of Najrān intending to utilize it, and found [the body of] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir inside a hollow there that had become filled with sand (dafn, difn). He was in a sitting position, with his hand covering the wound from the blow to his head, holding it firmly with that hand. When his hand was lifted off, the wound began to flow with blood, but when his hand was released, he placed it back on the wound and the flow of blood ceased. On [the finger of] his hand was a seal ring, with the inscription "My lord is God." A report was sent to ʿUmar telling him the story, and he wrote back to them: "Leave him alone, and replace the grave that was over him," so they did that.\(^{513}\)

When Daws Dhū Thaʿlabān threw off his pursuers in this manner, he pressed onward until he came to Qaysār, the ruler of al-Rūm.\(^{514}\) He requested his help against Dhu Nuwas and his troops, and told him what his people had suffered from them. Qaysār replied, however, "Your land is distant from our own and too remote for us to be able to reach it with our own armies, but I will write on your behalf to the king of Abyssinia, for he is a Christian also. He is nearer than us to your land, hence can give you aid, protect you, and exact vengeance on your behalf from those who oppressed you and who violently shed the blood of you and your coreligionists."

Qaysār sent back Daws with a letter to the king of Abyssinia in which was mentioned Daws's moral entitlement to help and what he and his coreligionists had endured, and Qaysār commanded the king of Abyssinia to provide Daws with succor and the means for him to exact vengeance for those who had treated him and his fellow Christians wrongfully.

\(^{512}\) That is, in the later 630s or early 640s.

\(^{513}\) This same story of the discovery of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir's corpse is found in al-Hamdānī, Iḵlīl, 134–35, tr. 80–81.

\(^{514}\) Here the narrative returns to the account of Ibn al-Kalbi broken off by this parenthesis from Ibn Ishāq.

When Daws Dhū Tha’labān presented Qaṣār’s letter to the Najāši,\textsuperscript{515} ruler of Abyssinia, the latter sent a force with Daws of seventy thousand Abyssinian troops, appointing as commander over them one of their number, an Abyssinian called Aryāṭ (? Arethas).\textsuperscript{516} He laid upon him the following charge: “If you secure the victory over (i.e., Dhū Nuwās and the Yemenis), kill a third of their menfolk, lay waste a third of their land, and capture and enslave a third of their women and children.” Aryāṭ set out with his troops. Among these last was Abrahah al-Ashram (“the man with a cut-off nose tip”).\textsuperscript{517} He crossed the sea with Daws Dhū Tha’labān until they landed on the coast of Yemen. Dhū Nuwās heard of their approach, and he collected together at his side Ḥimyar and those tribes of Yemen owing him obedience, but there were many dissensions and divisions in their ranks on account of the approaching end of the period [appointed by God], the suffering of hardships, and the coming down of punishment. There ensued no real battle and Dhū Nuwās was only able to engage in a certain amount of skirmishing, and then his troops were put to flight and Aryāṭ overran the land with his forces. Hence when Dhū Nuwās saw what had befallen him and his supporters, he headed his horse toward the sea; he whipped it onward and it went into the sea, bearing him through the shallows until it carried him into the deep water. He urged it onward into the open sea, and that was the last ever seen of him.\textsuperscript{518}

\textsuperscript{515} An accurate rendering of Ethiopic Nāgāsī, “ruler, king,” used also as a regnal title (and Anglicized as Negus). The Najāši figures extensively in the \textit{Sīrah} of the Prophet, in the first place in connection with the two \textit{hijrah}s of the first Muslims from Mecca to Abyssinia. See \textit{EP}, s.v. al-Nadjāši [E. van Donzel].

\textsuperscript{516} The reading of this name is uncertain; the manuscripts have Aryāṭ and Arbāṭ, but other renderings are possible. See the detailed discussion of the evidence from parallel Greek sources in Nöldeke, \textit{trans.} 190 n. 3.

\textsuperscript{517} Abrahah is the Arabic form of Ethiopic Abrēha.

\textsuperscript{518} Dhū Nuwās seems in reality to have been killed by the Abyssinians in battle; this final touch about the mode of his death must be a romanticizing, South Arabian one, as remarked by Nöldeke, \textit{trans.} 191 n. 2.

The events of the years immediately after Dhū Nuwās’s death are somewhat obscure. De Blois has suggested that the Abyssinian invaders, having disposed of Dhū Nuwās, set up a puppet Christian king called Abraham [not to be confused with the subsequent Abrahah] and then withdrew the bulk of their troops back Aryāt marched across Yemen with the Abyssinian army, killing a third of its menfolk, devastating a third of the countryside, and sending back to the Najāshī (the Negus) a third of the captured women and children. He remained there, imposing firm control over the land and reducing it to submission. A certain poet of the Yemenis has said, recalling how Daws Dhū Tha’labān had imposed upon them the yoke of the Abyssinians:

[Do not let anyone act] like Daws, and not like what he has fastened on his saddlebag [for us] [i.e., the yoke of the Abyssinians], that is, what he brought down on them in the shape of the Abyssinians; this has remained a proverbial saying in Yemen up to this day.

Dhū Jadan al-Ḥimyarī\(^{519}\) recorded the following lines, mentioning Ḥimyar and the humiliations it now suffered after its former

---

\(^{519}\)This poet, much cited by al-Hamdānī in his Iklil, appears in Nashwān al-Ḥimyārī, passim, as 'Alqamah Dhū Yazan and 'Alqamah b. Dhi Jadan. This name would connect him with Dhū Jadan, one of the eight leading noble families of Ḥimyar (see n. 507 above and n. 585 below), specifically from the Mārib region. See
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

...glory, and [recalling] the fortresses of Yemen Aryāt had destroyed, in addition to his devastation of the countryside, that is, Silhīn, Baynūn, and Ghumdān, castles without parallel among mankind:

Gently, [O woman!]. Tears cannot bring back what has gone by, and do not destroy yourself out of grief, recalling those who are dead.

After Baynūn, of which there is no visible trace and vestige, and after Silhīn, shall men ever construct [such] buildings again?

Dhū Jadan al-Ḥimyārī further said in this connection:

Leave me alone [O woman], may you be deprived of your father! You will not be able to deflect me from my resolve—may God heap shame on you, you have dried up my spittle!

When, to the music of singing girls, we became exhilarated by wine, and when we were given to drink the finest vintage, [that was indeed good].

Consuming wine is no shame for me, since my drinking companion does not reproach me at all for it.

---

520. These were former castles of pre-Islamic Yemen, and are mentioned as such by authors like al-Hamdānī in the eighth book of his Ikīlī devoted to the castles and fortresses of South Arabia, and Nashwān al-Ḥimyārī. Silhīn or Salīhīn, in South Arabian inscriptions sīhm, was the royal palace of the kings of Saba' at Mārib, the minting center for Sabaeans' coins and the building in South Arabia most frequently mentioned in the inscriptions. Ghumdān (gādn, ġmdn) was originally the royal residence at Ṣan'ā' of the Dhū Gurāt family, and is particularly frequently cited by the post-Islamic poets as an example of the transience of human achievement; in fact, although allegedly destroyed by the Abyssinian viceroy Abrahāb or the Islamic caliph 'Uthmān, it was several times refortified in the early Islamic centuries. Baynūn is located by al-Hamdānī in the eastern part of the lands of the Banū 'Ans. See al-Hamdānī, Ikīlī, 3-5, 12-21, 48-51, 54-57, tr. 8-9, 14-19, 36-38, 40; Nashwān al-Ḥimyārī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 10, 50, 81; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 535-36, III, 235, IV, 215-16; Müller, "Ancient Castles Mentioned in the Eighth Volume of Al-Hamdānī's Ikīlī and Evidence of Them in Pre-Islamic Inscription," 141-43, 145-47; Serjeant and R. Lewcock, "The Church (al-Qalīs) of Ṣan'ā' and Ghumdān Castle," 44; EP, s.v. Ghumdan (O. Löfgren).
No one can hold back the onslaught of death, even though he were to drink a healing remedy together with sniffing a perfumed medicament.

Nor can any monk in a cell (ṣṭwān, literally, doorway, portico)\(^{521}\) whose walls [are so lofty that they] abut on to the nests (literally, "eggs") of the vulture.

Ghumdān, of which you have been told, and which they constructed with a high roof\(^{522}\) on a mountain top, with skilled carpenter's (or smith's) work, and its lower part of hewn stone and choicest damp and smooth clay. Lamps filled with oil shine forth within it at eventide, like the gleaming of lightning flashes,

Its date palms are planted up against it, and the fresh dates almost bend the branches down to earth with their clusters. Yet this once-new fortress has now become a pile of ashes, and the consuming flames have transformed its former beauty.

Dhū Nuwās gave himself over to impending death, and he warned his people of the afflictions that were to come upon them.\(^{523}\)

Ibn Dhi'bah al-Thaqafi\(^{524}\) recited, remembering Ḥimyar when the black troops swept down on it and what the Ḥimyarite people suffered from them:

By your life, there is no escape for a man when death and old age overtake him!

By your life, a man has no open space to which he can flee, nor indeed, any refuge!

What moralizing example can there be, after what came upon Ḥimyar's tribes one morning?\(^{525}\)

---

521. For this word (< Greek stōa), see Dozy, Supplément, I, 22.
522. Reading, with al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 87, musmakān (= text, n. a).
523. As Nöldeke observed, trans. 194 n. 1, the poet seems to echo the implication of the prose accounts by Ibn al-Kalbi and Ibn Ḥishāq, that Dhū Nuwās was inadequately supported by his own followers, hence willingly sought his own death.
524. Ibn Hīshām's gloss in his Sirat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 27 ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 41, tr. 695, says that Dhi'bah was this poet's mother's name and that his own name was Rabi'ah b. 'Abd Yālīl b. Sālim. Nothing seems to be known about this poet of al-Ṭā'īf.
525. One could alternatively translate, "Can there be anything after there came
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

Namely, a swift-moving gathering of warriors and spearmen, [gleaming in the sun] like the heavens just after rain, With battle cries deafening the charging horses, and with their putting to flight the warriors with their stink, Witches like the very grains of sand in number, who make the tender branches of trees dry up [at their approach].

As for Hishâm b. Muhammad, he asserts that when the ships sent by Qaysar reached the Najashi, the latter transported his army by means of them, and the troops landed on the coast of al-Mandab. He related: When Dhu Nuwas heard of their approach, he wrote to the local princes (maqâwil) summoning them to provide him with military support and to unite in combating the invading army to repel it from their land. But they refused, saying, "Let each man fight for his own princedom (maqâlah)" and re-

527. Following the bi-al-dhafar of text, n. e, as also in al-Azragi and Ibîn Hishâm; the black Abyssinian warriors are depicted, as often in early Islamic writings on blacks, as stinking.

528. sa’âlî, sa’âlm, pl. of si’lat, often regarded as the female counterpart of the ghûl, a malevolent, demonic being, hence with the characteristics of a succubus or sometimes as a sâhirah or witch, enchantress. See G. van Vloten, "Dâmonen, Geister und Zauber bei den alterm Arabern. Mitteilungen aus Djahitz' Kitâb al-haiwân," Part I, 179–80; Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums, 152; Ep, s.v. Ghûl [D. B. Macdonald-Ch. Pellat].

529. That is, in the neighborhood of the Bâb al-Mandab, the straits connecting the Red Sea with the Gulf of Aden and the Arabian Sea. South Arabian inscriptions speak of mdbn and its s’s-s’ltl or s’s’sltl = silsilah (a chain across an inlet or harbor) in connection with the events of this period. Al-Hamdânî mentions only the Bâb al-Mandab as a headland dangerous for seamen but locates a town of al-Mandab on or near the Tihâmah coast at an unidentified spot between Farasân and the territory of the Banû Majdî b. Haydân; see his Sifat jazarát al-’Arab, 67, 72, 205, 258, and cf. Ep, s.v. Bâb al-Mandab (G. Rentz). Beeston, "The Chain of al-Mandab," r–6, discussed the passages of the Arabic historians and al-Hamdânî, and the mentions in the Byzantine Greek Martyrion Arethas, regarding the chain of al-Mandab and the landing(s) of the Abyssinians [since the latter source speaks of two landings, at spots widely apart]. He concluded that the reports of an actual chain are fully historical, and thought that its location was at the Khôr Ghurarrah, the inlet immediately behind the Cape of al-Mandab, see his map at p. 4.

530. Sing. migâwâl, reflecting the mqwl of South Arabian inscriptions, with the sense "prince, minor ruler," or the residence of such a ruler, and cognate with qayl [on which see n. 473 above]. See Beeston et al., Sabaic Dictionary, 110; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaeän Dialect, 449.
When Dhu Nuwas saw that, he had a large number of keys made, and then loaded them on to a troop of camels and set out until he came up with the [Abyssinian] host. He said: “These are the keys to the treasuries of Yemen, which I have brought to you. You can have the money and the land, but spare the menfolk and the women and children.” The army’s leader said, “I will write to the king,” so he wrote to the Najashi. The latter wrote back to the leader ordering him to take possession from the Yemenis of the treasuries. Dhu Nuwas accompanied them until, when he brought them into Ṣan‘ā’, he told the leader, “Dispatch trusted members of your troops to take possession of these treasuries.” The leader divided up his trusted followers into detachments to go and take possession of the treasuries, handing over the keys to them. [Meanwhile,] Dhu Nuwas’s letters had been sent to every region, containing the message “Slaughter every black bull within your land.” Hence they massacred the Abyssinians so that none were left alive except for those who managed to escape.

The Najashi heard what Dhu Nuwas had done and sent against him seventy thousand men under the command of two leaders, one of them being Abrahah al-Ashram. When they reached Ṣan‘ā’ and Dhu Nuwas realized that he had not the strength to withstand them, he rode off on his horse, came to the edge of the sea and rushed headlong into it; this was the last ever seen of Dhu Nuwas.

Abrahah set himself up as ruler over Ṣan‘ā’ and its dependent districts (makḥālif), but did not send any tribute or captured plunder back to the Najashi. The latter was informed that Abrahah had thrown off his obedience and now considered himself an independent potentate. Hence the Najashi sent against him an army commanded by one of his retainers called Aryāṭ. When Aryāṭ reached his camping place, Abrahah sent a message to him in these terms: “We are linked together by both the same homeland and the same faith, so we ought to look to the interests of our fellow countrymen and coreligionists who make up the troops who are with us respectively. So if you are agreeable, engage me in single combat, and whichever of us overcomes his opponent shall have the kingship, and the Abyssinians will not be killed because of our quarrel." Aryāt agreed to this, but Abrahah planned to act deceitfully with him. They appointed a place where the two of them were to meet [for the fight], but Abrahah placed in an ambush for Aryāt one of his slaves called 'r.n.j.d.h (?), in a depression in the ground, near the spot where they were to fight. When they met together, Aryāt moved forward first and lunged at Abrahah with his spear, but the spear slipped from off Abrahah's head and sliced off the end of his nose, hence his nickname of al-Ashram. Then 'r.n.j.d.h rose out from the depression and lunged with his spear at Aryāt, piercing his body and killing him. Abrahah said to 'r.n.j.d.h, "Name your own reward!" The latter said, "I claim the right to sexual intercourse with every women of Yemen before her marriage with her husband." Abrahah replied, "I concede that to you." 'r.n.j.d.h continued to enforce this right532 for a long period, until the people of Yemen rose up against him and killed him. Abrahah said, "The time has at last come for you to act as free men."533

531. For mikhlāf, see n. 462 above.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak 213

News of the killing of Aryāt reached the Najāšī, and he therefore swore that he would not rest in his mind until he had shed Abrahah's blood and overrun his land. News of the Najāšī's oath reached Abrahah, and he accordingly wrote back to him, "0 king, Aryāt was merely your slave, and I am your slave also, He advanced against me with the intention of weakening your royal power and of slaughtering your troops. I asked him to stop fighting me until until I might send an envoy to you; if, then, you should order him to desist from attacking me, [all right,] but if not, I would hand over to him all my power and possessions. However, he refused to accept anything except to make war on me. I thus attacked him and gained the upper hand over him. Any power that I possess is yours, but I have heard that you have sworn not to stop until you shed my blood and overrun my land. Hence I have now forwarded to you a phial of my blood and a leather bag of soil from my territory. By means of these, you will be able to secure release from your oath. I ask for the completion of your favor upon me, O king, for I am merely your slave; any power and splendor which I have is your power and splendor." The Najāshī regarded him [once more] with favor, and confirmed him in his office.534

532. Reading, with Addenda et emendanda, p. dxci, fa-ghabara for the text's fa-‘abara.

533. That is, for them no longer to support the dishonoring of their womenfolk. On the military struggle between Aryāt and Abrahah, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 943, p. 232 and n. 571 below.

The narrative returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq. He related: Aryāṭ remained in Yemen for several years in the course of that period of his rule. Then Abrahah the Abyssinian, who was one of his troops, fought with him over the Abyssinian dominion in Yemen until the Abyssinians became split into two groups, with one faction joining up with each contender. Then one of them marched against the other. When the troops drew near and approached each other, Abrahah sent a message to Aryāṭ: "You will not wish to cause the Abyssinians to encounter each other in battle to the

534. As described in n. 518 above, the invading Abyssinians set up in Yemen a ruler, Sumu-yafa' Aš'wa', Procopius's Esimphaios, who was now subordinate to the Abyssinian king Ella Ašbēḥa, Procopius's Hellesthaios. Abrahah, originally the slave of a Greek merchant in Adulis, led a revolt of malcontent Abyssinian troops against Sumu-yafa' in ca. 533, and replaced him as ruler in Yemen; subsequent expeditions sent in the next year or so by Ella Ašbēḥa, which must be the ones led by Aryāṭ in al-Ṭabarī's account here, were unable to dislodge Abrahah. After the Abyssinian king's death in ca. 536, the fait accompli of Abrahah's dominion in South Arabia was recognized by Ella Ašbēḥa's successors in Axum, but Abrahah would only agree to pay tribute to the Byzantine emperor Justinian I, as a remote suzerain unlikely to interfere in Yemeni affairs and trouble his untrammeled power there, rather than to the much closer Abyssinian king. In 657 Ḥimyārite era/a.d. 547–48, the celebrated inscription of Abrahah recording repairs to the Marīb dam mentions that he quelled a rebellion by a son of Sumu-yafa'. See Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.,” 459; Altheim and Steihl, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 449–51; Tringham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 300–301; EP2, s.v. Abraha [A. F. L. Beeston].

The circumstantial detail in the accounts both of Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Kalbī regarding Abrahah's dealings with Aryāṭ and 'Atwadah/'Atūdah must be legendary additions to the basic fact of Abrahah's assumption of power in Yemen. Al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 88, in his account of these events, has some additional touches, such as the fact that the Najāshī's residence was in arḍ Aksūm in the land of the Ḥabash. Even by early Islamic times, the name of Axum had virtually disappeared from Arab consciousness. It is mentioned in poetry written about Abrahah's "Expedition of the Elephant" against Mecca, with Abrahah called Abū Yaksūm, and 'Adī b. Zayd speaks of the al Barbar wa-al-Yaksūm = the Abyssinians, but when al-Hamdānī and Nashwān b. Sa'id mentioned it, it must have been a term from the remote past. See 'Adī b., Zayd, Dīwān, 47 no., 5; Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstefeld, 39–40, 45 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 61, 70, tr. 29, 33. Nöldeke, trans. 198 n. 2, took Barbar as a place name, the ancient form of modern Berbera = the coasts of Somaliland and Eritrea in general, and the name Barbaria for this is certainly found in the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea.
point that you destroy part of them, so come out against me and fight, and I will come out against you and fight, and whichever of us is able to smite his opponent, the latter's troops will come over and join the victor." Aryāt sent a reply: "You have proposed a just procedure, so come forth [against me]." Abrahah went forth; he was short, fleshy, and with a stout body, and held fast to the Christian faith. Aryāt marched out against him; he was a powerful, tall, and handsome man, and bore a spear in his hand. Behind Abrahah was a hillock that protected his rear, and concealed behind it was one of his slaves called `Atwadah (`Atudah). When the two contestants drew near to each other, Aryāt raised his spear and struck Abrahah's head with it, aiming at the top of his skull. But the spear-blow fell across Abrahah's forehead and split his eyebrow, eye, nose, and lip; for this reason, Abrahah was called al-Ashram. Abrahah's slave boy `Atwadah sprang upon Aryāt from behind Abrahah and killed him. Aryāt's troops then went over to Abrahah, so that all the Abyssinians in Yemen rallied to his side. `Atwadah said concerning the killing of Aryāt: "I am `Atwadah—from a base stock—without a noble father or mother," meaning, "Abrahah's slave has killed you."

He related: Al-Ashram at this point said to `Atwadah, "Choose what you wish, O `Atwadah . . . even though you have killed him; we have only now the responsibility for paying Aryāt's blood money." `Atwadah replied, "My choice is that I should have the first opportunity for sexual intercourse with every bride from the people of Yemen before she enters the possession of her husband," and Abrahah granted him this. He then handed over the blood money for Aryāt. Everything Abrahah did was without the knowledge of the Najāshī, king of the Abyssinians.

When news of all that reached the latter, he became filled with rage and said, "He has attacked my own commander and killed him without any instruction from me!" He swore an oath that he would not leave Abrahah in power until he had overrun his land and cut off his forelock. When Abraham heard this, he shaved his head and filled a leather sack with the soil of Yemen, and then sent it to the Najāshī with the message: "O King, Aryāt was only your slave, and I am your slave too. We disputed about your command; both of us owed you obedience, but I was stronger in directing the affairs of the Abyssinians, firmer and more skillful in statesmanship regarding them. When I heard about the king's oath, I shaved my head completely, and I have dispatched to him a sack of the earth of Yemen in order that the king may put it under his feet and thus fulfill his oath." When this message reached the Najāši, he showed Abrahah his favor [once more] and wrote back to him: "I confirm you in your office in the land of Yemen until such time as a further command of mine reaches you."

[535. According to the editor of the Cairo text, II, 129 n. 4, something has dropped out here.]

When Abrahah perceived that the Najāši had shown him favor and had appointed him viceroy over the Abyssinian troops and the land of Yemen, he sent to Abū Murrah b. Dhī Yazan and took from him his wife Rayḥānah bt. 'Alqamah b. Mālik b. Zayd b. Kahlān. The father of Rayḥānah was Dhū Jadan. Abū Murrah had a son by her, Ma'dī Karib b. Abī Murrah. She now had a son by Abrahah, after Abū Murrah, Masrūq b. Abrahah and a daughter by him, Basbāsah. Abū Murrah fled from him. Abrahah remained in Yemen, while his slave 'Atwadah was for a long time exercising there the right Abrahah had conceded to him as 'Atwadah's chosen reward; but then a man of Ḥimyar or of Khath'am536 attacked 'Atwadah and killed him. When Abrahah received the news of his death—and Abrahah was a magnanimous, noble leader, piously attached to his Christian religion537—he exclaimed, "The time is nigh for you, O people of Yemen, to have over you a man of solid judgment who is able to exercise the self-control appropriate to men of character. By God, if I had known, when I let 'Atwadah choose his own reward, that he would ask what he did, I would never have allowed him the choice and would never have heaped favors on him in any way. I swear by God, there shall be no blood price exacted from you for his death, and you will not receive any untoward retribution from me for his death."538

536. Khath'am b. Anmār were an Arab tribe of the Sarāt mountain region between al-Ṭā'īf and Najrān, i.e., the hinterland of the modern province of 'Asīr, although the tribe is not mentioned as such in the South Arabian inscriptions [personal communication from Professor Chr. Robin]. As al-Ṭabarī relates, I, 936–37, pp. 221–23 below, Abrahah is said to have marched into their territory en route for Mecca at the time of the "Expedition of the Elephant," defeated the Khath'am, and compelled their chief to guide him along the road to Mecca as far as al-Ṭā'īf. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 234, I, 45, 345; EP, s.v. Khath'am (G. Levi Della Vida).

537. As Noldeke remarked, trans. 200 n. 3, such an encomium hardly squares with Abrahah's long tolerance of 'Atwadah's behavior or with his own appropriation of Abū Murrah b. Dhī Yazan's wife.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bâbak

He (Ibn Ishaq) related: Abrahah now built the cathedral church (qalîs, qullays) at Șan’â’—such a church as had never been constructed on earth in its time. He then wrote to the Najâshi, king of the Abyssinians: “O king, I have constructed for you a church whose like has never been built for any monarch before you. I shall not give up until I have diverted the Arab pilgrims to it.”539 When

538. Al-Ṭabarî has thus given two versions of Abrahah’s rise to power and fame, those of Ibn al-Kalbi and of Ibn Ishaq, the two accounts being substantially in agreement. But in Abû al-Farâj al-Iṣfahâni, Aghânî3, XVII, 304–307, a fuller form of what was given by al-Dînawarî in his al-Akhbâr al-tîwâl, 62, there is a third account, in which Abrahah is a subordinate commander of ‘Aryâ’s, of low birth (lâ bayta lahu), who kills Aryât with a poisoned dagger. Abrahah’s lowly birth may be the origin ofProcopius’s tale that Abrahah was originally a slave in Adulis. See Nödeke, trans. 200 n. 4.

539. qalîs, qullays, via Syriac qalësâ, from Greek ekklesia. The site of this famous church is still shown in Șan’â’ as a large, shallow pit lined with courses of rubble masonry and called Ghurqat al-Qalis/al-Qullays, and Serjeant and Lewcock saw no reason to doubt that this site, near the citadel, is indeed that of Abrahah’s building, which had a west-east orientation like that of the Axumite churches of Abyssinia. Al-Azraqi, Akhbâr Makkah, 88–90, citing information from “trustworthy Yemeni shaykhs at Șan’â’,” provides a highly detailed and plausible account of the structure, stating that building stone for it was taken from the “palace of Bilqîs” at Mârib, and giving copious measurements of its various features. He further mentions a dome at what would have been the east end of the church, and in this last were two ornamented beams of teak (sâji) called Ku’ayb al-Ah.w.zî (this latter component of the name said to mean al-Ḥurr, “the free one,” “in their language”) and his wife, respectively, which were considered as objects of superstitious reverence. Shahtd has plausibly suggested that the dome covered a martyrium or shrine and that the images of Ku’ayb, and his wife were originally those of saints and martyrs, very probably those of Najrân: Ku’ayb’s name might be a reminiscence of the Najrân martyr al-Ḥâridh b. Ka’b and his wife could be the most celebrated women martyr of Najrân, Ruhaymah. Around the church was a large, open area to accommodate pilgrims and visitors, and corresponding to the Haram around the Meccan Ka’bah. Al-Azraqi, op. cit., 91–92, further describes how the church continued in use by the Christian community of Șan’â’ [which may have persisted up to the fourth/tenth century or beyond] until the ‘Abbâsid caliph al-Manṣūr ordered his governor in Yemen al-‘Abbâs b. al-Rabi’ al-Ḥâridhî to demolish it, a process that was accomplished but resented by the Șan’ânis, both Christian and Muslim, because of their reverence for Ku’ayb and his wife. Hence Nödeke’s comment, trans. 301 n. 1, that Christianity put down only weak roots in Yemen and at the time of the coming of Islam to the province had left hardly any trace, is clearly wrong. See Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 39–41;
the Arabs fell to talking about Abrahah’s letter to the Najashi, one of the men charged with intercalating the calendar (al-nasa‘ah) flew into a rage. He was one of the Banū Fuqaym, part of the larger tribal group of the Banū Mālik.540 He set out until he came to the cathedral church and then defecated (qa‘ada) in it, and then departed and reached his own land. Abrahah was informed about the incident and demanded, “Who perpetrated this deed?” They told him, “A man from that House at Mecca, to which the Arabs make pilgrimage, did it, because he had heard your words ‘I shall divert the Arab pilgrims to it (i.e., the new cathedral).’ He became enraged, came here, and defecated in it, aiming to show that it was not worthy of that purpose.” Abrahah himself became full of ire and swore that he would march against the House and demolish it.541

Now Abrahah had in his retinue some men of the Arabs who had come to him seeking his bounty, including Muḥammad b. Khuzā‘i b. Ḥuzābah of the Banū Dhakwān and then of the larger tribal group of the Banū Sulaym,542 together with a group of his

540. The Fuqaym b. ‘Adi were a branch of Mālik of Kinānah, a Ḥijāzī tribe who dwelt in the vicinity of Mecca and from whom sprang Quṣayy, founder of Quraysh’s fortunes in Mecca. They were said to have been entrusted, in pre-Islamic times, with the periodic intercalation of an extra month in the lunar calendar in order to make the Ḥajj or Pilgrimage coincide with the fairs and markets that accompanied it. If it had been true that Abrahah had planned to build up Ṣan‘a’ into a pilgrimage center rivaling Mecca, the Banū Fuqaym’s function as nasa‘ah or intercalators would have become otiose. See Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 30 = ed. Saqqā et al., I, 44–47, tr. 21–22; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Kitāb al-muhābbar, 156–57; Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskell-Strenziok, Jamhurat al-nasab, I, Table 47, II, 6, 247; al-Azragī, Akhbar Makkah, 125; EI², s.v. Kinānah [W. M. Watt], Nasi [A. Moberg].

541. The Arabic sources have differing information on the location of Abrahah’s church (Ṣan‘a’, Najrān, or a place on the seashore) and on the person(s) desecrating it [Nufayl b. Ḥabīb al-Khath‘āmī, a man or men from Kinānah, etc.], but all of them point to Quraysh of Mecca being the real instigators of the desecration or burning of the church, Kinānah being of course closely connected with Quraysh. See Kister, “Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jahiliyya to Islam,” 63–65 [utilizing information from Ps.-al-Aṣma‘ī, Nihāyat al-arab fī akhbar al-Furs wa-al-’Arab; see on this work n. 624 below].

542. Dhakwān b. Thal‘abah were one of the three great subdivisions of the fellow tribesmen, including his brother, Qays b. Khuzāʾī. While they were at Abrahah's court, there came round unexpectedly for them one of Abrahah's festivals. He sent along to them on that feast day some of his morning meal. Abrahah used to eat [animals'] testicles. When Abrahah's food was brought to them, they protested, "By God, if we eat this the Arabs will never stop blaming us for it as long as we live!" Muḥammad b. Khuzāʾī arose and went to Abrahah, saying, "O king, today is our festival when we eat only the flank and forelegs [of beasts]." Abrahah replied, "We will send you what you like; I was only showing honor to you with food from my morning meal because of your high status in my eyes." He then crowned Muḥammad b. Khuzāʾī and appointed him governor over Mudar. He further commanded him to go out among the [Arab] people and summon them to make pilgrimage to the cathedral, the church he had built. So Muḥammad b. Khuzāʾī went off until he reached a spot in the territory of the Banū Kinānah. Meanwhile, the people of Tihāmah had received information about Muḥammad's mission and what he was aiming to do, so they dispatched against him a man of Hudhayl called powerful North Arab tribe of Sulaym b. Maṣūr, whose territories in Ḥijāz lay between Mecca and Medina, but bordered closely on Mecca; in both the pre-Islamic and the post-Islamic periods, Dhakwān were the closest Sulami allies of the Meccans, intermarrying with some of the leading clans of Quraysh, including Umayyā. Muḥammad b. Khuzāʾī b. ‘Alqama b. Ḥuzābah, who is said here to have been appointed chief over the tribes of Muḍar for Abrahah and who, according to Ibn Sa’d, was actually crowned by Abrahah, has a certain fame through being one of the few people who bore the name Muḥammad in the Jāhiliyyah. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamhurat al-nasab, I, Table 125, II, 18–19, 235, 517; Muḥammad b. al-Ḥabīb, Kitāb al-muḥabbār, 130; idem, Kitāb al-munammaq, 68–72; M. J. Kister, "Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliyya to Islam," 72; Lecker, The Banū Sulaym. A Contribution to the Study of Early Islam, 91–98, 108–19; EP, s.v. Sulaym [Lecker]
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

543. The Arabs are reported to have been repelled by certain of the customs and food practices of the Abyssinians; cf. the poet of Hudhayl's revulsion from his Abyssinian wife cited by Nöldeke, trans. 203 n. 2. But it seems strange that the Arabs of that time should have objected to eating animals' testicles when, at the present day, they are eaten as a delicacy all over the Middle East.

544. That is, the lowland strip along the Red Sea shores, running the length of what was in later times the provinces of Ḥijāz, ’Asīr and Yemen. See Yaqūt, Buldān, II, 63–64; EP, s.v. Tihāma [G. R. Smith; and for its pre-Islamic history, Robin, "La Tihāma yéménite avant l'Islam: Notes d'histoire et de géographie historique," 222–33.
'Urwah b. Hayyād al-Milāşi who shot Muḥammad with an arrow and killed him. Muḥammad’s brother Qays was with him, and when Muḥammad was killed, he fled and went to Abrahah, informing him of Muḥammad’s death. This sent Abrahah into an even greater rage and fury, and he swore that he would lead an expedition against the Banū Kinānah and tear down the House [at Mecca].

Hishām b. Muḥammad related, however, as follows: After the Najāshi had restored Abrahah to favor and had confirmed him in his charge, the latter built the church at Ṣan’ā’. He made it a marvelous building, whose like had never been seen before, using gold and remarkable dyestuffs and stains. He wrote to Qayṣar

546. Abrahah’s appointment of Muḥammad b. Khuzā‘i and then his invasion of Hijāz, which later Meccan lore may have transformed into the “Expedition of the Elephant,” seems to have been part of a far-reaching policy of extending Abrahah’s dominion into central and even northern Arabia, confronting there Persia and its allies, through alliances with and favors to the Bedouin tribes of those regions. This was clearly the case with the expedition which he led into central Arabia in ca. 552, which included contingents from Kindah and Ma’add and which defeated the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III at Ḥuluban or Ḥalaban (see n. 409 above). The poet of al-Ta’if, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, an older contemporary of the Prophet Muḥammad, speaks of “kings of Kindah, heroic warriors, fierce in battle, falcons” around Abrahah’s elephant in the expedition of that name (Sharḥ diwān Umayyah, ed. Sayf al-Dīn al-Kātib and Ahmad ‘Īsām al-Kātib, 65; Bahjah ‘Abd al-Ghafūr al-Ḥadīthī, Umayyah b. Abī al-Salt, hayātuwu wa-shi‘ruhu, 337–38 no. 154; Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 40 – ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 62, tr. 30). Procopius states that the Byzantine emperor tried to bring together in an alliance “Qays,” specified in a parallel source as “the prince of Kindah and Ma’add,” with the viceroy of the Abyssinians (cited by Nöldeke, trans. 204 n. 2).

It is clear that Abrahah’s expedition to Mecca, whatever its place in the history and chronology of events at that time (see regarding this, n. 563 below), contained substantial bodies of Arab tribesmen as well as a core of Abyssinian troops, even though the account of Ibn Isḥāq, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 936, p. 222 below, speaks—for obvious reasons of Arab-Islamic national pride—of the attackers as being wholly Abyssinians and of the Arabs as solidly united against them in defense of the Holy House in Mecca. Abrahah received a welcome in al-Ṭā‘if and assistance to find his way to Mecca (al-Ṭabarī, I, 937, p. 223 below), and varying traditions on the expedition speak of participation in Abrahah’s army by South Arab tribes like ‘Akk, Ashār, Khath’am, Balhārith, and Khawlan, and by North Arab tribes like Sulaym of Muḍar. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb in his Munammag, 70, refers to the incident of the Mudari troops recoiling from eating animals’ testicles and implies that the food habits of North and South Arabs were different. See Kister, “Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliya to Islam,” 67–73.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

telling him that he intended to build a church at Ṣan`a’ whose traces and whose fame would last forever and asked for the emperor’s aid in this. Qayṣar accordingly sent back to him skilled artisans, mosaic cubes, and marble.547 When the building was completed, Abrahah wrote to the Najāshī that he planned to divert to it the pilgrims of the Arabs. When the Arabs heard that, they regarded it with perturbation and it assumed momentous proportions in their eyes. A man from the Banū Mālik b. Kinānah went off until he reached Yemen, entered the temple, and defecated in it. Abrahah’s wrath was aroused, and he resolved to lead an expedition against Mecca and to raze the House to the ground. He set off with the Abyssinian army, including the elephant.548 Dhū Nafar al-Ḥimyari encountered him in battle. Abrahah fought with him and captured him. Dhū Nafar pleaded, “O king, I am nothing but your slave, so spare me, for keeping me alive will be more useful to you than killing me”; so he spared him. Abrahah marched onward. Nufayl b. Ḥabib al-Khat’ami opposed him, but Abrahah engaged him in battle, putting his supporters to flight and capturing him. Nufayl asked Abrahah to spare him; Abrahah agreed, and made him his guide in the land of the Arabs.

547. This seems perfectly feasible, given that, in early Islamic times, the Umayyad caliph al-Walid I asked the Byzantine emperor (presumably Justinian II) to send skilled artisans and mosaic cubes (al-fusayfisa, from Greek psephos, the word used here in al-Tabari’s text) for the decoration of the Umayyad Mosque at Damascus and the Prophet’s Mosque at Medina. See H. A. R. Gibb, “Arab-Byzantine Relations under the Umayyad Caliphate,” 51–56. As mentioned in n. 539 above, we have highly detailed descriptions of the interior decoration of Abrahah’s church, which included a lavish use of tropical hardwoods, gold, silver, mosaic cubes, jewels, etc., in both the portico (aywan) of the church and the part of the basilica beneath the dome (qubbah). It is improbable that all this could have been achieved without outside assistance. The completed building must indeed have seemed like a wonder of the world, and explains the attachment of the local people, both Christian and Muslim, to it (see n. 539 above). As well as the account by al-Azraqi referred to in the above-mentioned note, see also the account of the church by the thirteenth-century Egyptian Coptic author Abū Śālīḥ al-Armanā (one which may possibly have been influenced by the author’s knowledge of Egyptian church interiors), The Churches and Monasteries of Egypt, trans. B. J. A. Evetts, 300–302; Serjeant and Lewcock, “The Church (al-Qalis) of Ṣan`a’ and Ghumdān Castle,” 47.

548. Noldeke, trans. 206 n. 1, cites the Byzantine historian John Malalas that the Abyssinian king rode one of the four elephants pulling the royal coach or cart. Whether Abrahah actually rode on the elephant here is not explicit.
The narrative returns to the account of Ibn Ishaq. He said: When Abrahah decided on an expedition against the House [at Mecca], he ordered the Abyssinians to prepare for the campaign and put themselves in a state of readiness, and he set out with the army and with the elephant. He related: The Arabs heard about this; they found the news alarming and were filled with fear at it. They regarded fighting in defense of the Ka'bah, God's Holy House, as a duty laid upon them when they heard of Abrahah's intention to tear it down. A man who was one of the nobles of the Yemenis called Dhū Nafar rose up against him and summoned his people, and those of the Arabs who responded to his call, to make war on Abrahah and oppose him strenuously in defense of God's House and in the face of Abrahah's intention of demolishing and reducing it to a pile of ruins. A certain number rallied to his side. He confronted Abrahah, but Abrahah attacked him, and Dhū Nafar and his followers were put to flight. He himself was taken prisoner and brought before Abrahah. The latter was on the point of killing him when Dhū Nafar said to him: "O king, don't put me to death, for it may be that my presence at your side could be more advantageous for you than killing me." Abrahah therefore desisted from killing him, but kept him in captivity by him, loaded with fetters; Abrahah was a magnanimous man.

After this, Abrahah continued onward in accordance with his plan, intending to do what he had set out to do, until when he reached the territory of the Khath'am, he was opposed by Nufayl b. Ḥabib al-Khath'amī with a force from the two component tribes of Khath'am, Shahrān, and Nāhis, and others from the tribes of the Arabs who followed him. He attacked Abrahah, but the latter routed him. He was taken prisoner and brought before Abrahah. Abrahah intended to put Nufayl to death, but he pleaded with him: "O king, don't kill me, for I will act as your guide through the land of the Arabs; these two hands of mine are your sureties for the obedience and good behavior of the two tribes of Khath'am, Shahrān, and Nāhis." Hence Abrahah spared him and released

549. In the genealogy of Khath'am, these two subdivisions were the descendants of two of the great-grandsons of Khath'am b. Ammār; the name of Shahrān survives today. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 124–25, II, 345.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

him. Abrahah went forth with Nufayl, the latter acting as his guide along the road until they reached al-Tā'if.\(^{550}\) Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib came out with the men of Thaqīf,\(^{551}\) and addressed Abrahah: “O king, we are your servants, obedient and submissive to you, and you will not find us offering any resistance to you. This house of ours (they meant [the house of] Allāt) is not the House which you seek. You want the House which is at Mecca (they meant the Ka'bah), and we will send a man with you who will guide you.” He therefore passed them over and did not molest them.

They sent with him Abū Righāl [as guide], and Abrahah departed, accompanied by Abū Righāl, until the latter brought him as far as al-Mughammis. As soon as he had conducted Abrahah thither, Abū Righāl died at that very place. The Arabs subsequently hurled stones at his grave; it is this grave at which people hurl stones at al-Mughammis [today].\(^{552}\) When Abrahah en-

---

\(^{550}\) Muhammad b. Ḥabib, Munammaq, 68, says that Abrahah gathered together a force, “a motley crew of the evildoers of the Arabs” (fussaq al-'Arab wa-ṣaknāārīhim), mainly from Khath'am and the Banū Munabbih b. Ka'b b. al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b, said to have been traditionally hostile to the Ka'bah, and all under Nufayl's leadership. This author, at least, does concede that, pace Ibn Ishāq (see n. 546 above) Arabs were included in Abrahah's army.

\(^{551}\) As Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib says here, the shrine of the pre-Islamic goddess Allāt was located at al-Ta'if, and the popularity of its cult made it a considerable rival to that of Allāh in the Ka'bah of Mecca during pre-Islamic times, until the shrine was despoiled and destroyed at the surrender of al-Ta'if in 8/630.

\(^{552}\) Abū Righāl is at best a semilegendary figure, the story of whose guiding Abrahah to Mecca may have been elaborated as part of the anti-Thaqīf bias of pietistic Muslim circles hostile to the role of prominent men of al-Ta'īf within the Umayyad caliphate like 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abihi and al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. However, the practice of stoning Abū Righāl's alleged burial place must have developed early, as attested to by mention of it in a verse of the Umayyad poet Jarīr (d. 110/728-29 or shortly thereafter) cited by al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 93. Al-Mughammis or al-Mughammas was a valley just off the Mecca to al-Ta'īf road on the edge of the Haram of Mecca. See al-Bakri, Mu'jam mā ī斯塔'ījam, II, 1248; Yaḥūt, Buldān, V, 161–62; IP, s.vv. Abū Righāl [S. A. Bonebakker] and al-Mughammas camped at al-Mughammis, he sent forward one of the Abyssinians called al-Aswad b. Maqsûd (or Mafṣūd) with a troop of cavalry until al-Aswad reached Mecca, from where he sent back to Abra-hah captured beasts taken from the people of Mecca, Quraysh, and others. Among these, Abrahah acquired two hundred camels belonging to 'Abd al-Muţţalib b. Hâshim, at that time the paramount chief and lord of Quraysh.553 Quraysh, Kinânah, Hudhayl, and all the rest of the people who dwelled in the Holy Enclosure (al-Ḥaram) contemplated giving fight to Abrahah’s forces, but then realized that they lacked the power to resist him, so renounced the idea.
Holders of Power after Ardashîr b. Bābak

Abrahah sent Ḥunāţah al-Ḥimyari to Mecca and instructed him: “Ask who is the lord and noble leader of this territory, and then inform him that the king tells them, ‘I have not come to make war on you, but have merely come to destroy the House. If you do not wish to defend it by force of arms, then there will be no need for us to shed your blood; and if he (i.e., ‘Abd al-Muţţalib) does not intend to oppose us by fighting, then bring him back to me.’” Now when Ḥunāţah entered Mecca, he asked who was the lord and noble leader of Quraysh, and was told that this was ‘Abd al-Muţţalib b. Hâshim b. ‘Abd Manâf b. Quṣayy; so he went to him and delivered the message Abrahah had commanded him to communicate. ‘Abd al-Muţţalib replied, “By God, we don’t want to fight with him, for we have no power to do so. But this is the Holy House of God and the House of His friend Ibrâhîm (Abraham),” or words to that effect, “and if He defends it against him, well, it is [ed.]. The custom of stoning Abû Rîghâl’s grave bears an obvious resemblance to the ritual stoning of Satan at Minâ in the course of the Pilgrimage ceremonies. See

Nöeldeke, trans. 208 n. 1, citing the anthology al-Kāmil of al-Mubarrad, noted that in post-Islamic times Hudhayl were still reviled for having guided the Abyssinians against the Ka‘bah, but he considered this to be really an echo of the alleged role of Hudhaflîs in guiding Tubba’ Tubân As’ad Abû Karîb against the Ka‘bah, see

553. The importance of the figure of ‘Abd al-Muţţalib, great-grandson of Quṣayy and grandfather of the Prophet, has doubtless been inflated by Islamic tradition. At the time of Abrahah, he was clan chief of Hâshim and probably the de facto leader of a group of Meccan clans who tried to negotiate with Abrahah if only to gain some advantage over their rivals within Mecca, but we have no solid information about his role here, and Nöeldeke, 209 n. 1, was justly skeptical. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 113–16; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 30–33; EP, s.v. ‘Abd al-Muţţalib [W. M. Watt].
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

His House and His sanctuary; whereas if He allows Abrahah to get possession of it, then, by God, we have no one who can defend it from him," or words to that effect. Ḥunāṭah told him, "You must come back [with us] to the king, for he has ordered me to bring you to him."

Ḥunāṭah accordingly set off with 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the latter accompanied by one of his sons, until they reached the army camp. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib enquired after Dhū Nafar, who was a friend of his, and was directed to him, Dhū Nafar being however in confinement. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib said, "O Dhū Nafar, have you any means of relief for the trouble which has come upon us?" The latter replied, "What relief is possible from a man held captive at the king's hand, one who expects to be killed at any moment (literally, "in the morning or evening")? I can't avail at all in regard to your misfortune, except that Unays, the keeper of the elephant, is a friend of mine. I will send a message to him and will commend you to him, put the case to him for helping you as strongly as possible, and ask him to try to arrange an audience for you with the king. So make your request to him, and Unays will intercede with him on your behalf as skillfully as possible for him." 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib responded, "That's as much as I can hope." Dhū Nafar accordingly sent a message to Unays, and came to him saying, "O Unays, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib is the chief of Quraysh and master of the Meccan caravan ('īr); he feeds the people on the plains and the wild beasts on the mountain peaks. The king has seized two hundred of his camels, so I ask permission for him to come before 554. Following the suggested emendation of text, n. e, fa-jā'ahu.

---

555. Thus in text, in Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 51, and in al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 94, but Ibn Hishām, op. cit., ed. Wüstenfeld, 33, trans. 25, has 'āyn, "well," i.e., the well of Zamzam in Mecca.

556. An allusion to the rifādah, the supplying of provisions to pilgrims and traders coming to Mecca for the Hajj and its attendant fairs. It was linked to another service, that of siqāyāh, the supplying of water, nabiḍh or date wine, and the semiliquid foodstuff sawiq to the pilgrims also. Both of these were said to have been established in Mecca by Quṣayy for the 'Abd al-Dār clan but usurped by the 'Abd Manāf clan, of whom Hāshim were a component. These rights are adduced by later Islamic authors as showing the nobility of the Prophet's clan in pre-Islamic times, but in reality must have been not so much philanthropic or social services as much as lucrative sources of revenue for the holders Hāshim. See Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, 89–101; Bosworth, "The Terminology of the History of the Arabs in the Jāhiliyya According to Khwārazmī's 'Keys of the Sciences,'" 31–33.
the king, and be as useful as possible on his behalf." Unays replied, "I'll do that." Unays spoke to Abrahah, saying, "O king, this is the chief of Quraysh, now in your court, who is seeking an audience of you. He is master of the Meccan caravan, and feeds the people on the plain and the wild beasts on the mountain peaks. So grant him permission to come before you, so that he may tell you his request, and treat him kindly!"

He related: Abrahah granted 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib an audience. Now 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib was an impressive, handsome, and well-built man. When Abrahah beheld him, he treated him with too great a respect and kindness to allow 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib to sit below him. Abrahah did not, however, want the Abyssinians to see him letting 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib sit at his side on his royal throne, so he came down from his throne and then sat on his carpet, bidding 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib sit on it also by his side. He then told his interpreter to ask him what was his request of the king. The interpreter passed these words on to 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib, and the latter said, "My request of the king is that he should give me back the two hundred camels of mine which he has seized." When the interpreter informed Abrahah of this, Abrahah told him through the interpreter, "You impressed me favorably when I saw you, but I went off you [zahidtu fika] when you spoke to me. Do you speak to me about the two hundred camels which I seized, and brush aside a House that enshrines your religion and the religion of your forefathers, and which I have come to destroy, and say nothing to me about it?" 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib replied: "I am the owner of the camels; the House has a lord of its own who will defend it." Abrahah said, "He won't be able to defend it against me!" But 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib retorted, "That's your own affair; just give me back my camels!"

A certain learned scholar has asserted that 'Abd al-Mu'ttalib had gone to Abrahah, when the latter sent Ḥunāṭah to him, accompanied by Ya'mar b. Nufāthah b. 'Adī b. al-Du'ūl b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, who was at that time chief of the Banū Kinānah, and Khuwaylid b. Wāthilah al-Hudhayl, chief of Hudhayl at the time. They offered Abrahah a third of the wealth (amwāl) of Tihamah if he would go back home and not destroy the House, but [557] Following the correct reading for this name in Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-Nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 34 = ed. al-Saqqa et al., I, 52, trans. 25, and in al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 95, against the 'Amr of the text.

---
he refused. But God is more knowing [about the truth of this]. At any rate, Abrahah had meanwhile restored to 'Abd al-Muţţalib the camels he had seized.

When they left him, 'Abd al-Muţţalib went back to Quraysh and told them the news. He ordered them to go forth from Mecca and seek refuge on the mountain tops and in the defiles, fearing violent behavior from the [Abyssinian] army. 'Abd al-Muţţalib then arose and took hold of the door-ring, that of the door of the Ka'bah, and a group of Quraysh stood with him praying to God and imploring His help against Abrahah and his troops. 'Abd al-Muţţalib recited at the time when he took hold of the door-ring of the Ka'bah:

O Lord, I don't hope for any one but you against them!
O Lord, defend your sacred area (himā) from them!558
Indeed, the enemy of the House is the one who is attacking you!
Repel them lest they lay waste Your settlements!

Then he further recited:

O God, a servant [of God] defends his dwelling, so protect Your dwelling places and their people (hilālak)!559
Let not their cross and their cunning craft (miḥāl) prevail over
Your cunning craft on the morrow!560
But if You do that [i.e., abandon them], then it may be something which seems most appropriate [for You] and an affair which appears best to you.

558. In pre-Islamic Arabia, himā, "protected area," denoted a stretch of pasture or hunting or other desirable land set aside for the use of a particular group and protected by that group. Many himās gradually acquired taboos and a religious aura from tribal deities, hence by the time of the coming of Islam, the Haram of Mecca had become the protected area par excellence. See Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums2, 105–09; Lammens, Le berceau de l'Islam, 60–64; EI2, s.v. Ḥimā (J.
Chelhod).
559. Reading thus for the text's ḥalālak [hilāl = pl. of hillah], following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCI, and Glossarium, p. CXCIX, but with more or less the same meaning anyway.
560. Reading ghadwan for the text's 'adwan, following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCII. The verse echoes the Qur'ānic use of miḥāl "the cunning craft and force [of God]" in surah XIII, 14/13, God being depicted elsewhere in the Qur'ān (II, 47/54. VIII, 30) as "the best of those who use craft and guile, makh".
And if You do that, well, it is an affair which will complete your [divine] plan of action.

When some person comes to you seeking peace, we hope that You will act toward us in a like manner.

Then they turned back, having gained nothing but humiliation; perdition was coming upon them there.

I never heard of the most reprobate of men who desired glory and who then violated the sanctity of Your sacred enclosure (harām).

They brought into action the assembled host of their land and the elephant, in order to capture and enslave members of your families.

They attacked your sacred area (hima) with their cunning, out of sheer savagery (jahlan), and paid no heed to Your exaltedness.561

Then `Abd al-Muttalib let go of the ring of the door, the door of the Ka'bah, and set off with his companions of Quraysh to the mountain tops and sought refuge there, in expectation of what Abrahah was going to do in Mecca when he entered it. Next morning, Abrahah prepared to enter Mecca, got ready his elephant (whose name was Maḥmūd), and drew up his army. Abrahah was determined upon destroying the House and then returning to Yemen. When they drove the elephant forward, Nufayl b. Ḥabib al-Khath'amī came up and stood by its flank. He then got hold of its ear and said, "Kneel, O Maḥmūd, and go [then] straight back whence you came, for you are in God's sacred territory!" Then he let go its ear; the elephant knelt down,562 while Nufayl b. Ḥabib made off at top speed and clambered up the mountain. The soldiers beat the elephant to make it get up, but it refused. They beat its head with a battle axe to make it get up, but it still refused. They stuck hooks into its soft underbelly and scarified it to make it rise, and yet again it refused. But then they turned it round to face back to Yemen [i.e., southward]; it got up and trotted off. They 561. Nöldeke notes in text, n. d, that the last three verses of this poem are in a different meter (wâfir) from the rest of it (kâmil) and that some manuscripts have rearranged the wording of these three verses to make them fit the kâmil meter of the whole poem. Otherwise, one must assume that we have here verses from two separate poems, even though they share the same rhyme in -ak/-ik.

---

562. As pointed out by Nöldeke, trans. 213 n. 1, elephants do not kneel down like camels, a fact already recognized by one of the scholiasts of Ibn Hishâm.
pointed it in the direction of Syria (i.e., northwards), and it behaved exactly the same. They pointed it in the direction of the east, and it again did likewise, but when they made it face Mecca, it knelt down.

God now sent down on them a flock of birds, like swallows, each bird bearing three stones like chick peas and lentils, one stone in its beak and two in its claws. Everyone whom the birds hit [with the stones] perished, although not all of them were in fact hit.563 They retreated in haste along the road they had come,

563. The description of the divine visitation on Abrahah’s impious forces is connected, as here, by the compilers of the Sūrah of the Prophet and subsequent commentators with Qur’ān, CV, Sūrat al-Fil. But as both Gordon Newby and Irfan Shahid have noted, the connection is by no means explicit in the Qur’ān. There is no mention in the sūrah of place or time, the object of the attack or the identity of the attackers themselves. Moreover, Shahid adds that the agents of the destruction of the āṣḥāb al-fil are by no means clearly the birds of vv. 3–4, described there as sweeping down in flocks (ābābīl) bearing sījīl. These last have been traditionally interpreted as “stones of baked clay,” and this meaning fits the context here and in the other two Qur’ānic attestations of the word, cf. EP, s.v. Sījīl [V. Vacca-Ed.], but F. de Blois now suggests that sījīl stems ultimately from the pre-Islamic religious tradition of North Arabia and may even have been in origin the name of a local deity, see his forthcoming “Ilijaratun min sījīl.” The birds may have been scavengers after the work of destruction wrought by God Himself, if one follows the variant reading yarmihim, “[He] pelted them,” for the accepted text tarmihim, “[they, i.e., the birds] pelted them.” Shahid doubts whether Muhammad’s Meccan audience could have been misled by assumptions about an event that had taken place only two generations previously. Instead, we must regard the later Islamic tradition as supplying a specific reference for what was, at the time of its revelation in Mecca, rather, an eschatological description of the imminence of punishment for unbelieving peoples. See G. H. Newby, “Abraha and Sennacherib: A Talmudic Parallel to the Tafsir on Sūrat al-Fil,” 433–34; I. Shahid, “Two Qur’ānic Sūras: al-Fil and Qurayyāt,” 431, 433–44, and cf. R. Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz2, 523.

Whatever the original significance and message of Sūrat al-Fil, rationalizing interpretations of the story of Abrahah’s abortive expedition against Mecca arose early, mainly involving the explanation that the attacking forces were struck down by mass disease or by an epidemic, such as measles or smallpox mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, l, 945, p. 235 below, reducing Abrahah’s combatant power and compelling a withdrawal. An explanation from smallpox was put forward in ḥadīths going back to the Successor Ḥārram [d. 105/723–24], and in one line of poetry cited by Ibn Ishāq from the verse written on the “Expedition of the Elephant” by Muhammad’s opponent in Mecca, ‘Abdallāh b. al-Zibārā al-Sahmī [on whom, see Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XV, 139–84], “Sixty thousand men [i.e., Abrahah’s forces] did not return to their land, and their sick ones did not survive after the return home.” See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 39 = ed. al-Saqā et al., I, 59, tr. 28, EP, s.v. al-Fil [A. F. L. Beeston].

The historicity of some move by Abrahah against Mecca seems likely, given the undoubted fact that his sphere of military activity extended as far as central Araasking Nufayl b. Ḥabib to guide them along the way to Yemen. When Nufayl b. Ḥabib saw what God had sent down on them as punishment, he said:

Where can a man flee, when God is pursuing [him]? Al-Ashram (i.e., Abrahah) is the conquered one, not the conqueror! Ho, Rudaynah,\(^564\) may greetings be upon you! When we went forth this morning, our eyes rejoiced at you! A seeker after fire from among you came to us yesterday evening, but he was unable to get anything from us. If you had been able to see, O Rudaynah—but you were not able to see it—what we saw in the vicinity of al-Muḥaṣṣab,\(^565\)

\(^{564}\) That is, the poet is, in accordance with poetic convention, addressing a real or imaginary beloved, Rudaynah.

\(^{565}\) Literally, "ground strewn with pebbles," a valley near Miṇā through which the pilgrims pass on the return from Miṇā to Mecca at the end of the Ḥajj. On halting there, ṭahṣīb, the act of throwing pebbles, is a recommended (mustahabb)
You would have exonerated me and praised my good judgment, and not have grieved over what has passed and gone between us.\textsuperscript{566}

I praised God when I saw with my own eyes the birds, but feared that the stones might be rained upon us.

All the people are asking for Nufayl, as though I owed the Abyssinians a debt.\textsuperscript{567}

As they retreated, the Abyssinian troops were continually falling by the wayside and perishing at every watering place (or halting place, \textit{manhal}). Abrahah was smitten in his body; they carried him with them, with his fingers dropping off one by one. As each finger dropped off, there followed a purulent sore in its place, which exuded pus and blood, until they brought him to \textit{San'ā'}, with him looking like a newly born chick (i.e., plucked and emaciated). They allege that, as he died, his heart burst out from his breast.\textsuperscript{568}

Al-Hārith related to me, saying: There related to us Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. ‘Umar\textsuperscript{569}—‘Abdallāh b. ‘Uthmān b. Abī Sulaymān—his father. There also related to us from Muḥammad

\begin{footnotes}
\item[566] Taking \textit{baynā} as standing for \textit{baynana}.
\item[567] Nöldeke, trans. 214 n. 2, commented that these verses are ostensibly part of a longer poem but contain many details and features have no connection with the supposed circumstances of their composition. In fact, they correspond in verse form, rhyme, and, to some extent, in wording, to an old poem in the \textit{Hamāsah} anthology of the \textquote{Abbasid poet Abū Tammām, demonstrating that the verses have been modeled on this latter poem.
\item[568] This tale of the manner of Abrahah's death is perhaps a transference to him of the army's being afflicted by disease, see n. 563 above. It is also given in Ibn Hishām, \textit{Sīrat al-nabi}, ed. Wüstenfeld, 36 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 55–56, tr. 27, and al-‘Azraqī, \textit{Akhbār Makkah}, 97–98, the latter author adding that some stragglers and deserters from the Abyssinian army, and other elements had been attached to it, came into Mecca and stayed there, working as laborers and camel herders. This seems quite feasible, but less so the \textit{khabar} going back to ‘Ā’ishah (born ca. 614) quoted by al-‘Azraqī, op. cit., 98, 103, according to which she saw the elephant's conductor and its groom as blind beggars for food in the center of Mecca. See Nöldeke, trans. 219 n. 1; also Muhammad b. Ḥabīb, \textit{Munammaq}, 73–76.
\item[569] That is, the \textit{khabar} here goes back to Muḥammad b. ‘Umar al-Wāqidi (d. 207/823), a member of the Medinan historical school who worked in Baghdad, and to his secretary and transmitter, Ibn Sa'd (d. 230/845). See Sezgin, \textit{GAS}, I, 294–97, 300–301, \textit{EP}, s.vv. Ibn Sa'd (J.W. Fück) and al-Wāqidi (S. Leder).
\end{footnotes}
b. 'Abd al-Rahmān b. al-Salmānī—his father. There also related to us 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Zuhayr al-Ka'bī—Abū Mālik al-Ḥimyarī—Aṭā' b. Yasār. There also related to us Muhammad b. Abī Sa'id al-Thaqafi—Ya'lā b. 'Aṭā'—Wakī' b. 'Udus—his paternal uncle Abū Bazīn al-'Uqaylī. There also related to us Sa'id b. Muslim—'Abdallāh b. Kathīr—Mujahīd—Ibn 'Abbās. Parts of some narratives are combined with others. They say: Al-Najāshī had dispatched Ayrāt Abū Ṣaḥām with a force of four thousand men to Yemen. He subjugated and conquered it. He gave rewards to the local kings but treated the poor with contempt. There arose a man from among the Abyssinians called Abrahāh al-'Ashram Abū Yaksūm. He invited the people to give him allegiance, and they responded, so he then killed Ayrāt and seized control of Yemen. He observed the local people getting ready, at the time of the festival, for pilgrimage to the Holy House [in Mecca], and asked, "Where are the people going?" They told him that they were making pilgrimage to God's House at Mecca. He enquired, "What is it made of?" They replied, "Of stone." He said, "What is its covering (kiswa)?" They responded, "The striped Yemeni cloth (al-waṣā'il), which comes from here." Abrahāh swore, "By the Messiah! I will certainly build for you something better than that!" So he built for them a house constructed from white, red, yellow, and black marble, and adorned it with gold and silver, and encompassed it with jewels. He provided it with doors made with sheets of gold and with golden nails, and set the space between them with jewels, which included an enormous ruby. He provided it with a covered sanctuary (hijab), in which sweet-smelling aloes wood was continually burnt, and its walls were smeared with musk, thereby darkening the walls until the jewels [encrusted on them] appeared sunken. He gave orders to the people, and they made pilgrimage to it, as did a large number of the tribes of the Arabs over a period of years. There lived permanently within this temple men who made perpetual adoration and service to God there, and who devoted themselves to worshiping Him in it.

Nufayl al-Khath`ami was planning to do by stealth something unpleasant to it. One night, when he saw no one moving around, he got up and took some excrement and smeared the apse of the high altar (qiblah) of the temple with it, and he gathered together some putrefying animal carcases and threw them into it. Abrahah was told about this; he became extremely angry and exclaimed, "The Arabs have only done this out of vexation on account of their own House; I shall certainly destroy it stone by stone!" He wrote to the Najashi informing him of that and asking the Najashi to send him his elephant Maḥmūd—this being an elephant unparalleled in the whole earth for its size, stout body, and strength. The Najashi accordingly dispatched it to him.

Once the elephant had arrived, Abrahah set out with his army, accompanied by the king of Ḥimyar and Nufayl b. Ḥabib al-Khath`ami. When he reached the Sacred Enclosure (al-Ḥaram), he commanded his troops to raid the beasts of the local people. They captured some camels belonging to ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. It happened

573. kāna yuʿarridu lahu; for arrada, see Glossarium, p. cxi. Here we have a variation from the man of the Banū Fuqaym who is responsible for the desecration of the church in Ibn Ṣaḥāq’s account given by al-Ṭabarī, I, 934, p. 218 above, and, since Nufayl is said at I, 937, p. 223 above, to have guided Abrahah to al-Ṭaʿif, a confusion also. Al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 62–63, has "a man from the people of al-Tihmāmah" as the perpetrator of the deed.

574. The use here of the technical term qiblah, literally, "direction to be faced [in the Muslim worship]," is an anachronism.

575. The malik Ḥimyar must be Dhu Nafar, called at I, 936, p. 222 above, "one of the nobles of Ḥimyar."
that Nufayl was a friend of ‘Abd al-Mu’talib’s, so the latter spoke to Nufayl about his camels. Nufayl, therefore, spoke to Abrahah, saying, “O king, there has come to you the lord of the Arabs, the most distinguished of them in status and the foremost of them in nobility—he gives people swift horses as mounts, bestows largesse, and feeds whatever the wind blows along.” He brought him into Abrahah’s presence, and the latter said [to ‘Abd al-Mu’talib], “What’s your request?” ‘Abd al-Mu’talib replied, “That you should give me back my camels.” Abrahah retorted, “I consider what I have just heard from you nothing but fraud. I had expected that you would speak to me about your House, which is your source of nobility and pride.” But ‘Abd al-Mu’talib merely said, “Give me back my camels and do what you like with the House, for it has a lord who will protect it.” So Abrahah ordered the camels to be returned to him.

When ‘Abd al-Mu’talib took possession of them, he draped the soles of sandals round their necks, marked them as intended sacrifices, offered them as gifts [to the Sacred Enclosure], and let them scatter throughout the sacred enclosure. [He did that] so that if anyone of them should be seized [by the Abyssinians], the lord of the Sacred Enclosure would thereby become angered.576 ‘Abd al-Mu’talib, accompanied by ‘Amr b. ‘A‘idh b. ‘Imran b. Makhzûm, Mu‘tâm b. ‘Adi and Abû Mas‘ûd al-Thaqafi, went up to Mount Ḥirâ577 and recited:

O God, a man defends his dwelling, so protect your dwelling places and their people (ḥilālak).
Let not their cross and their cunning craft overcome Your cunning craft on the morrow.

576. Qur’ān, V, 2, refers to the qalā‘id, necklets hung round the necks of animals destined for sacrifice, budn, part of the sha‘ā’ir Allāh mentioned in XXII, 37/36. There is also reference in V, 102/103, to various types of camel, including the sā‘ibah, the wasilah and the ḥāmi, left to roam freely after dedication to God. See Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums, 112ff.; EP, s.v. Bahira (A. J. Wensinck). Seizure by the Abyssinians of the camels released by ‘Abd al-Mu’talib would thus incur Allāh’s wrath.

577. Ḥirâ or Ḥarâ‘ was a mountain outside Mecca mentioned later in the Sīrah as a place where Muhammad, in the period before his public ministry, would spend time in tahannuth, pious and ascetic exercises. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 132; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 40, 44; EP, s.v. Ḥirâ’ [T. H. Weir-W. M. Watt].
But if You do abandon them and our qiblah, then it may well be something which seems best to You.

He related: The birds flew in from the sea successively. Each bird had three stones, two in its claws and one in its beak. They hurled down the stones upon the Abyssinian troops, and everyone who was hit suffered either a severe wound or else that spot erupted into blisters and pustules. (That was the first time that smallpox and measles and bitter shrubs appeared [in the land].) Thus the stones snuffed them out completely, and God sent a torrential flow of water, which swept them all away and hurled them into the sea. He related: Abrahah and the survivors who were with him took to flight. Abrahah's limbs began to drop off one by one. As for Mahmūd, the Najāshi's elephant, it lay down and would not venture into the Sacred Enclosure and was thus preserved in safety; but regarding the other elephant, it ventured into the Sacred Enclosure and it suffered a hail of stones. It is also said that there were thirteen elephants. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib went down from Mount Ḥira and two of the Abyssinians came up to him, kissed his hand and said, "You were more knowledgeable than us." There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Iṣḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utba b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akmas, who said that the first time measles and smallpox were seen in the land of the Arabs was in that year, as also the first time for bitter shrubs like rue, colocynth, and gigantic swallow-wort to be seen.

Ibn Iṣḥāq says: On Abrahah's death, there succeeded to power in Yemen over the Abyssinians his son Yakṣūm b. Abrahah. Abrahah's patronymic was from him. Ḥimyar and the tribes of the Arabs submitted, and the Abyssinians treated them oppressively,

---

578. That is, a sayl, the torrent from a sudden rainstorm, typical of the erratic weather conditions in the mountains in the western part of the Arabian Peninsula. In Arabic lore, the sweeping away of peoples by such inundations is not infrequent; cf. the sayl al-'arim, “bursting of the dam by a torrent,” in Qur'ān, XXXIV, 15/16. See Lammens, _Le berceau de l’Islam_, 23-25.
579. wa-lam yashja ‘alā ...; for this verb, see Glossarium, p. cccvi.
580. Following the text's fa-huṣiba, one might also read fa-haṣaba “and it suffered blisters and pustules,” as taken by Nöldeke in his trans. 209.
581. That is, _Asclepias gigantea_ L.
582. That is, Abū Yaksūm. According to Nöldeke, trans. 219 n. 3, there exists a coin minted by Yaksūm.
taking their women as sexual partners, killing their menfolk, and employing their sons as interpreters between themselves and the Arabs. He related: After God hurled back the Abyssinians from Mecca, and the latter received the punishment described above, the Arabs treated Quraysh with great honor, saying, "[They are] the people of God; God fought on their behalf and relieved them of the burden of their enemies.

He related: On Yakṣūm b. Abrahah's death, there succeeded to power in Yemen his brother Masrūq b. Abrahah. The burden of oppression on the people of Yemen became protracted. The Abyssinian dominion in Yemen extending from the time when Aryāt came to Yemen until the Persians killed Masrūq and expelled the Abyssinians from the land, was seventy-two years. During that period, four kings ruled there successively: Aryāt, then Abrahah, then Yakṣūm b. Abrahah, and finally, Masrūq b. Abrahah.

Sayf b. Dhi Yazan al-Ḥimyarī, whose patronymic was Abū Murrah, went forth until he reached the court of Qayṣar, king of al-Rūm. He complained to Qayṣar about what they were suffer-

---

584. The seventy-two years given here for the Abyssinian domination must be a considerable exaggeration, since this rule extended in reality only from 525 to ca. 570, i.e., forty-five years. In Abū al-Faraj al-Ṯisfahānī, *Aghānī*³, XVII, 311, the respective reigns of the Abyssinian governors are given: Aryāt, twenty years; Abrahah, twenty-three years; Yakṣūm, nineteen years [thus also in al-Dinawari]; Masrūq, twelve years; total, seventy-four years. Of these, that of Aryāt is much exaggerated; Abrahah was certainly still alive in 552, the date of the well of Murayghān inscription, itself five years after his Dam of Mārib inscription. This would leave eighteen years at most for the combined reigns of Yakṣūm and Masrūq. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 220 n. 3.

585. Yazan was one of the great families of South Arabia, accounted one of the Mathāmīnāh, influential in Ḥḍrāmawt and known [as Yz'n] in inscriptions from the mid-fifth century A.D. onward. It appears that their original center was in the Wāḍī 'Amāqīn area near al-Ḥawtaḥ in what became in modern times the hinterland of al-Mukallā. The family or clan appears in early times in association with the ancient Sabean family or clan of Gadan or Dhū Gadan. By the early sixth century, the Yazan probably dominated all the Ḥḍrāmawt and the Ṣafār coastlands as well as the island of Socotra, whence their title of Dhū implying lordship. Members of the family served the last Tubba' Ma'di Karib and then Dhū Nuwās as ing, and asked him to expel the Abyssinians and take over the rule there personally.\textsuperscript{586} [He asked him to] send what forces he pleased of the Byzantines, and then the rule over Yemen would be his; but Qaṣṣār would not satisfy his plea, and he got none of the satisfaction he sought from Qaṣṣār.

So he set out again until he arrived at al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir's court at al-Ḥīrah. Al-Nu'mān was Kīsra's governor over al-Ḥīrah and adjacent parts of Iraq in the land of the Arabs.\textsuperscript{587} Sayf b. Dhi Yazan now complained to al-Nu'mān about the oppression and humiliation the people of Yemen were suffering. Al-Nu'mān replied, "I have the obligation of paying a formal visit to Kīsra every year, so stay with me until the time for it comes round, and I will take you with me." He related: So he remained with al-Nu'mān until the latter set off on his visit to Kīsra, accompanied by Sayf b. Dhi Yazan. When al-Nu'mān came into Kīsra's presence and had completed his own business with the king, he mentioned to him Sayf b. Dhi Yazan and the reason for his coming to him, requesting an audience for him; Kīsra granted this. Kīsra was in his throne chamber (aywān mājlīṣīhī), where his crown was kept. This crown was like a huge grain measure (qanqal),\textsuperscript{588} and set with rubies, emeralds, pearls, gold, and silver, and was suspended by a \textsuperscript{586} The Byzantine emperor at this time was Justin II (r. 565–78). There is no record in Byzantine sources of this alleged embassy from South Arabia.

\textsuperscript{587} This is a patent confusion with the last Lakhmid, al-Nu'mān III b. al-Mundhir IV (r. ca. 580–602); the ruler in al-Ḥīrah at this time must have been 'Amr II b. al-Mundhir III (b. Hind) or his brother and successor Qābūs b. al-Mundhir III. See Rothstein, Lahmīdīn, 96–105. In Ibn al-Kalbī's version of these events (al-Ṭabarī, I, 950, p. 242, cf. n. 596 below), the conjecture is expressed that it was 'Amr b. Hind.

\textsuperscript{588} In al-Khwārizmī's Mafātīḥ al-ʿulūm, 67, the qanqal is a large measure of capacity used in Iraq and equalling three thousand ratsīs, i.e., two "equalised" kurrs, but the latter measure itself varied considerably even within the Sawād of Iraq. See Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārizmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 148–49.
golden chain from the top of the dome of that chamber. The crown was too heavy for his neck to bear, so he concealed himself in robes until he sat down on that throne; his head was inserted into the crown, and when he had settled down comfortably on his throne, the robes were whisked away from him. Everyone who saw him for the first time fell down on his knees out of awe for him, hence Sayf b. Dhi Yazan sank down on his knees when he entered his presence.

Then he addressed Kisra, “O king, ravens have seized control over our land,” and when Kisra asked him, “Which ravens, those from Abyssinia or those from Sind?” he replied: “The Abyssinians, and I have come to you imploring help against them and for you to expel them from our midst. You can then assume the royal power in my land, for you are more loved by us than them.” Kisra retorted, “Your land is far away from our own one, and your land is poor in resources: nothing there but sheep and camels, which are no use to us. I am not prepared to commit a Persian army to the land of the Arabs; there is no good reason why I should do this.” However, he ordered Sayf b. Dhi Yazan to be given ten thousand dirhams of full weight, and gave him a fine robe of honor. Sayf b. Dhi Yazan took the money, went forth, and began distributing it wholesale among the people, so that boys, slave boys, and slave girls seized it avidly. Very soon, this was reported to Kisra, who was told, “The Arab to whom you gave a sum of money is scattering the dirhams among the people, and slave boys, boys, and slave girls are scrambling for them.” Kisra said, “There is something strange about this man, bring him back to me!” When Sayf b. Dhi Yazan came into his presence, Kisra said, “This is what you do with a royal gift! You distribute it among the people?” Sayf b. Dhi Yazan responded, “And what exactly should I do with the king’s gift, when the mountains of the land from which I have come are composed wholly of gold and silver?” [He said this] in order to excite the emperor’s cupidity, when the latter saw how little Sayf

589. Since the ancient Persians tended to classify all blacks as “Indians,” a usage taken over by Greek and Syriac writers, there arose uncertainty over the geographical extent of “India,” which could cover South Arabia and the Horn of Africa. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 222 n. 2.

590. Sayf b. Dhi Yazan’s boast reflects the ancients’ belief that South Arabia was a land of famed wealth, with its precious metals, perfumes and aromatic substances, etc.
was concerned about the money. [He continued] “I have only made my way to the king that he might preserve me from tyranny and relieve me of humiliation.” Kisra said to him, “Remain here with me while I consider your case,” so he remained at Kisra’s court.

Kisra assembled his Marzbāns and the sagacious advisers he was wont to consult, and said, “What do you think about this man and the proposition he has made?” One of them said, “O king, you have in your prisons various men whom you have incarcerated in preparation for killing them. Why don’t you send them back with Sayf? If they perish, well, that is the fate you ordained for them, and if they gain control of his land it will be an additional kingdom to your own.” Kisra exclaimed, “That’s a good idea. Count for me how many men there are in my prisons.” These men were counted up, and they found a total of eight hundred men in the prisons. Kisra then ordered, “Find out the man among them with the best achievements and lineage, and make him the commander over them.” They found that the best person qualified in these respects was Wahriz, who was a man of mature years. Kisra accordingly sent him with Sayf and appointed him commander of his troops.

In the Arabic sources, noble birth from various origins is attributed to Wahriz, e.g., in Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 43 - ed. al-Saqā et al., I, 65, trans. 31, that he was of advanced age and of good, unspecified, family; in al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 63–64, that he was a centenarian (!) and the son of Kānjār, of noble stock but imprisoned because he had taken to highway robbery, in al-Mas`ūdī, Mūrūj, III, 163 – § 1016, that he was the Ispabahd of Daylam; and in Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, Tuˇrikh, 52, that he was from the progeny of Bihāfardūn, son of Sāsān, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār. It would be usual for the commander of an expedition to be of high rank and birth, but unlikely that his troops, if they had been rescued from incarceration and the threat of death, to have been of good stock also, as is asserted by a poet of Hadramawt cited by al-Mas`ūdī, op. cit., III, 164 – § 1017 (“... from the clan of Sāsān and the clan of Mahrasan”) and by Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, loc. cit. Such claims to exalted origins were doubtless fabricated by or for the descendants of the Persians in Yemen, the so-called Abnā’, the children of unions between Persians and Arabs in Yemen. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 223 n. 2. But in any case, these reports from Ibn Ishaq and Ibn al-Kalbi (for the latter report, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 952–53, pp. 244–45 below) that Yemen was conquered by a force of gaolbirds and desperadoes must be regarded as romantic accretions to the real story of the Persian expeditionary force to Yemen as mentioned at I, 899, p. 160 above: that Wahriz’s force was composed of tough Daylamite mountaineers, recruited as mercenaries for the specific task, see n. 405 above.

Wahriz/Wahriz is presumably MP Weh-rēz, “having a good abundance,” see Justi, Namenbuch, 340. It seems, however, to have been in origin a title rather than a personal name; Procopius, describing an expedition sent by the emperor Kawād I into Georgia and Lazica, calls its commander a “Persian” named Boēs, who had the
He provided them with eight ships, each one carrying a hundred men plus equipment and supplies for the sea voyage. However, when they got out into the open sea, two of the ships foundered with everyone and everything in them. But six ships safely reached the coast of Yemen in the region of Aden, and these contained six hundred men, including Wahriz and Sayf b. Dhi Yazan. When they were safely on dry land in the land of Yemen, Wahriz said to Sayf, "What resources do you have?" Sayf replied, "As many Arab soldiers and Arab horses as you wish; I will put my leg on your leg [over this], so that we either die together or conquer together." Wahriz said, "You have spoken fairly and eloquently." Sayf now brought to Wahriz's standard those of his people who were in his obedience.

Masruq b. Abrahah heard about their arrival. He assembled round himself the Abyssinian army and marched against them. The two armies moved close to each other and encamped in close proximity to each other. Wahriz now sent one of his sons called Nawzādḥ\(^{592}\) with a cavalry detachment and instructed him, "Engage in skirmishing with the enemy army, so that we may get to know their mode of fighting." Nawzādḥ sallied forth and engaged in some skirmishing with them, but then got himself into a spot from which extrication was impossible, and the enemy killed him. This aroused Wahriz to a frenzy of rage and made him more determined to fight them. When the opposing troops were drawn up in ranks against each other, Wahriz said, "Point out their king for me." They replied, "Do you see a man on an elephant, with a crown on his head and a red ruby on his forehead?" He said, "Yes," and they retorted, "That's their king!" He said, "Leave him alone for the present," and they waited a long time. Then he said, "What's he riding?" They replied, "He has mounted a horse now." He said, "Leave him alone," and again they waited a long time. He said, "What's he riding now?" They replied, "He has mounted a mule now." Wahriz said, "A wild ass's filly! He is a weak individual, and so is his kingdom! Are you listening to me properly? I am going to shoot at him. If you observe his guards still standing around and not moving, then stand fast until I give you the command [to advance], for I shall have missed him. But if you see the enemy troops crowding round him and sticking close to him, I shall have hit the man, so launch an attack on them!" Then he strung his bow (according to what has been asserted, none but Wahriz himself could bend it because of its strength). He ordered his eyelids to be fastened up, placed an arrow in his bow, braced the bow as widely as possible until, when it was fully extended, he released it. The arrow struck the ruby on Masrūq's forehead, and penetrated through his head, coming out at the nape of the neck. Masrūq was thrown backward from his mount, and the Abyssinians crowded round him closely. The Persians charged at them, and the Abyssinians were defeated. The Persians made great slaughter, and groups of the Abyssinians fled in all directions. Wahriz advanced against Ṣan'ā' with the intention of entering it, but when he reached the city gate, he said, "My banner shall never enter [a town] lowered! Break down the gateway!" The gateway of Ṣan'ā' was accordingly demolished, and he then entered it with his banner raised high and borne in front of him.

---

\(^{592}\) That is, "the newborn." See Justi, Namenbuch, 227.

Once he had secured dominion over Yemen and had expelled the Abyssinians from it, Wahriz wrote to Kīṣrā, "I have subdued Yemen for you and have driven out those Abyssinians who occupied it," and he forwarded to him wealth. Kīṣrā wrote back ordering him to set up Sayf b. Dhi Yazan as ruler of Yemen and its territories, and he imposed on Sayf the responsibility for the poll.

593. That is, because the muscles of his eyelids were relaxed with old age and drooped over his eyes. A similar explanation is given for the name of a Persian commander in the fighting with the Arabs during the caliph 'Umar I's reign, one Dhū al-Ḥājib ("the man with the eyelid") Mardānshāh; see al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 251. This seems to have been something of a topos in early Arabic, since a leader of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah at the late sixth-century "Day of Jabalah" [see EP, s.v. Djabalá [F. Buhl-R. H. Headley]] is likewise said to have had his eyelids falling into his eyes. See Naqā'id Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 657, 1062, and cf. Caskel, Aijām al-ʿarab. Studien zur altarabischen Epik, 36.

594. As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 226 n. 2, the story of Wahriz's battle with Masrūq is also given by Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyun al-akhbār, I, 149, from "the books of the Persians." In his account, Wahriz has drawn from his quiver an arrow of good omen with his wife's name inscribed on it, which he interprets as Persian zanān, "women," and then as the exhortation zan ān, "strike that [person]," hence he launches the arrow at Masrūq and kills him, as al-Ṭabarî relates. Cf. also Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 81.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

[950] tax and the land tax, which he was to send to Kislā annually as fixed sums. He also ordered Wahriz to return to him, and Wahriz did this. Sayf b. Dhī Yazaṇ was thus appointed as ruler over Yemen as his father Dhū Yazaṇ, one of the kings of Yemen, had been [before him]. This is what Ibn Ḥumayd transmitted to us—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq concerning the affairs of Ḫimyar, the Abyssinians and their rule, and Kislā's dispatch of an expedition to attack the Abyssinians in Yemen.595

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he relates as follows. After Abra-hah, there reigned Yaksūm and then Masruq. He related: It was this last whom Wahriz killed in the reign of Kislā, son of Qubādh, and then expelled the Abyssinians from Yemen. He related: Among what he related is that Abū Murrah al-Fayyāḍ Dhū Yazaṇ was one of the nobles of Yemen. He had a wife Rayḥānah bt. Dhī Jadan, and she presented him with a boy, whom he called Ma'dī Karib. She was beautiful, hence al-Asḥram took her away from Abū Murrah and forced her to marry him. Abū Murrah departed from Yemen and came to one of the kings of the house of al-Mundhir—I think it was 'Amr b. Hind596—and asked him to write on his behalf to Kislā, asking him to tell Kislā about his high worth, his nobility, and his aid and support for Kislā in any affair in which he could help the emperor. [The ruler in question from the house of al-Mundhir] replied, "Don't act rashly; I am obliged to visit Kislā each year, and the time for this is so-and-so." Hence Abū Murrah remained at his court until he accompanied the ruler on his visit to Kislā. 'Amr b. Hind went into Kislā's presence; he mentioned to him Dhū Yazaṇ's nobility and lofty estate, and sought permission for him to have an audience of the emperor. Dhū Yazaṇ went in, and 'Amr made space for Dhū Yazaṇ to go before him. When Kislā observed that, he realized that 'Amr could have treated Dhū Yazaṇ thus in his presence only out of regard for his nobility. When Dhū Yazaṇ went up to the emperor, the latter treated him kindly and questioned him in a friendly way, saying to 596. As noted in n. 587 above, Ibn al-Kalbi's conjecture here is probably correct.

Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

him, "What has brought you here?" Dhū Yazan replied, "O king, the blacks have seized from us power over our own land, and have committed things so frightful that my respect for the king makes me shrink from mentioning them. If the king were to offer us help without our having to ask for it [formally], that would be appropriate for him because of his excellence, nobility, and preeminence over the rest of monarchs; why should this not be so, when we have made our way toward him, full of expectations regarding him, hoping that God will smash our enemies, aid us against them, and procure for us revenge over them? If the king sees fit to make our speculations come true, fulfill our hopes and send back with me an army that will eject this enemy from our land so that he may add it to his own kingdom—for it is one of the most fertile of lands and most amply endowed with resources, not like the region of the Arabian peninsula bordering on his empire [at present]—he may do all this."

Kisra replied, "I know well that your land is as you describe it, but which blacks are they who have conquered it, the Abyssinians or the Sindis?" Dhū Yazan said, "The Abyssinians." Anūsharwān said, "I would certainly like to make your speculations come true, and would like to enable you to go back home with your request fulfilled, but the way to your land is difficult for the army, and I would not like rashly to commit my troops. But let me think about your request. Meanwhile, you can stay here with whatever you like." He ordered Dhū Yazan to be given suitable lodging and to be treated hospitably. He remained at Kisra's court until he died. Abu Murrah had composed an ode in the Himyaritic language in which he eulogised Kisra. When it was translated for him, he was delighted with it. 597

597. The South Arabian language had, in fact, been in steep decline long before this time, and the story of Abu Murrah being able to compose a poem in the "Himyaritic language" must be apocryphal. Chr. Robin, basing himself on such indications as a perceptible decline in the quality and correctness of the Sabaean language in the later inscriptions, believes that it had yielded place, as a spoken tongue, to early [North] Arabic by the fourth century A.D. Hence after ca. 400 it was only a learned language, increasingly poorly known, although still used epigraphically for a further century and a half. The latest dated inscription so far discovered, CIH 325, comes from 669 of the Himyarite era, hence A.D. 559–60, although some graffiti found in northern Yemen at Umm Laylā north of Sā'dah, in North Arabic language and South Arabian script, probably date from the beginning Rayḥānāh bt. Dhī Jadan gave birth to a son of Abrahāh al-Ashram’s, whom he called Masrūq. Māʿdi Karīb b. Dhī Yazan grew up with his mother Rayḥānāh in Abrahāh’s house. One of Abraḥāh’s sons satirized him, and said to him, “May God curse you!
And may God curse your father!” Māʿdi Karīb had never realized that al-Ashram was anyone but his own father. He went along to his mother and said to her, “Who is my father?” She replied, “Al-Ashram.” He retorted, “No, by God, he is not my father; if he were really my father, so-and-so would not have satirized me.” So she told him that his father was [in reality] Abū Murrah al-Fayyāḍ, and communicated to him the whole story. All this had a profound effect on the lad’s mind, but he bided his time for a long period.

Then al-Ashram died, followed by the death of his son Yaksūm.
Dhū Yazan’s son set out, making for the king of the Byzantines’ (al-Rūm) court, avoiding Kīsrā because he had delayed so long in helping his father. But he did not get what he wanted from the king of the Byzantines, and found him taking the side of the Abyssinians because they shared a common religious allegiance.
Hence he turned away from the Byzantine court and made for the court of Kīsrā. He presented himself before Kīsrā one day, when he was on horseback, and called out to him, “O king, my future heritage lies in your hands!” Kīsrā summoned him when he had dismounted and asked him, “Who are you, and what is this heritage of yours?” Dhū Yazan’s son replied, “I am the son of the senior chief (shaykh) of the Yemenis, Dhū Yazan, whom you promised to aid, but then [in the end] he died at your court and in your entourage. That promise is my rightful due, and a heritage which you have an obligation to fulfill for me.” Kīsrā relented toward him and ordered him to be given a sum of money. The lad went out and began to scatter the dirhams about, and the people scrambled for them. Kīsrā sent a message to him, “What has led you to do what you have done?” The lad replied, “I didn’t come to of Islam. See Robin, “Résultats épigraphiques et archéologiques de deux brefs séjours en République arabe du Yémen,” 188–93.

In the fourth/tenth century, al-Ḥasan al-Ḫamdānī was able in his Ikīl, Book VIII, 122–23, tr. 72–73, to give the values of the letters of the South Arabian script (musnad), but was only able with difficulty to read a few names of the inscriptions.
See Robin, L’Arabie antique de Karīb’il à Mahomet, 15, 19–20, 134–35; idem, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. II, cols. 1216–17.
you seeking money, but rather, I came to you seeking men and that you should preserve me from humiliation." Kisrā was pleased with this rejoinder and sent back a message to him, "Stay here while I look into your case."

Kisrā then sought counsel from his ministers concerning sending an army back with him. The [Chief] Mōbadh said to him, "This lad has a just claim upon us, through his journey here and the death of his father at the king's court and in his entourage, and because of the promises made by the king to him previously. Now in the king's prisons are men of valor and martial strength. Let the king send these men with Dhū Yazan's son; if they secure a victory, it will be a triumph for the king; if they all perish, he will have secured his own peace of mind [from the threat of them] and will have relieved the citizens of the kingdom of them. That would not be far from the correct line of action." Kisrā said, "This is a sound piece of advice," and he gave orders for the men of this description in the prisons to be counted. They extended to eight hundred men. He appointed as commander over them a commander from among his cavalrymen [asāwiratihi] called Wahriz, whom Kisrā accounted the equal of a thousand cavalrymen. He supplied them with weapons and equipment and ordered them to be transported in eight ships, each one containing a hundred men.

They set forth on the seas, but two ships out of the eight foundered, leaving six safe and sound. They landed on the coast of Ḥadramawt. Masrūq marched out against them with an army of one hundred thousand men, including Abyssinians, Ḥimyarites, and Bedouins. [However,] a considerable number of people joined the son of Dhū Yazan. Wahriz encamped on the sea coast, placing the sea at his back. When Masrūq saw how few were their numbers, he became eager to engage them. He sent a mes-

598. It seems likely that the ships, buffeted by storms, would come up on the Ḥadramawt coast, and apparently the landing was in the vicinity of al-Shihr. The Ḥadrami poet cited by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 164 = § 1017, says that the ships were washed up at M.th.w.b, read by Pellat as Mathwah but read by Nöldeke, trans. 230 n. 2, as Manūb. A Manūb certainly existed in Ḥadramawt in Islamic times, and it is mentioned by al-Hamdānī, Siḥāt jazīrāt al-ʿArab, 172 and n. 2, 215, but described by him as a wadi with villages in the territory of Kindah and in the Shibām/al-Qārah region, i.e., well inland and away from the coast. Al-Bakri's listing of Manūb, in his Muʿjam maʿ istaʿjam, I, 316–17, IV, 1273, is vague and unhelpful.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Babak

sage to Wahriz, "What has brought you here? You have only the [few] men whom I can see, while I have [the large number] whom you can see. You have recklessly put yourself and your followers at risk, but if you like, I will allow you to return to your homeland; I shall not hurl satires at you, nor will there be inflicted upon you any unpleasant action on my part or on that of my troops. Or if you wish, I will march out against you immediately. Or yet again, if you wish, I will allow you a period of respite (ajal) so that you may consider your position and take counsel with your followers." Wahriz realized how strong they were and perceived that he could not match their strength. So he sent to Masrūq the message, "All right, grant a period of respite for us both; give me an engagement and compact, and receive in return the same promises from me, that neither side should fight with the other until the period of truce is up and until we can see our [correct] course of action." Masrūq agreed to that.

Each side remained within its encampment. Then, when ten days had elapsed of the standstill in hostilities, Wahriz’s son set off on one of his horses and went forward until he drew near to the enemy’s encampment. But his horse carried him onward into the midst of their encampment, and they killed him, Wahriz being unaware of all this. When the news of the killing of his son reached him, he sent a message to Masrūq, "There has been, as you well know, a compact between us, so why did you kill my son?" Masrūq sent a message back, "Your son charged into the midst of our encampment, and some irresponsible elements of our army sprang up and killed him. I myself strongly disapprove of his killing." Wahriz said to the messenger, "Tell him that he was not my son, but only the son of a whore (zāniyah); if he had been my son, he would have patiently waited and not broken the truce between us until it had come to an end." Then he ordered the corpse to be thrown down on to the ground, where his body could be seen, and he swore an oath that he would not drink wine nor

---

599. Nöldeke, trans. 232 n. 1, explained that Wahriz disowns his son and refuses any responsibility for him because he does not wish to have to accept blood money for him from the Abyssinians; the blood money will be their own blood. Also, the killing of the Persian, though half-justified, will incur divine retribution for the breach of the oath-protected truce.
rub his head with any scented oil until the truce should come to its end.

When there was just one day left of the truce, Wahriz gave orders for the ships in which they had sailed to be set on fire, and likewise with regard to all superfluous clothing they had with them, leaving his men only with what they had on their backs. Next, he ordered all their provisions to be brought out and instructed his men, “Eat up this food!” So they ate up [as much as they could]. When they had finished, he ordered what remained to be thrown in the sea. At that point, he stood up in their midst and made a speech, saying to them, “Regarding the ships of yours which I caused to be burned, I wanted you to realize that there is no way for you ever to return home. Concerning your clothing which I had burned, it was arousing my ire that, should the Abyssinians gain the victory over you, it should fall into their hands. As for your food which I caused to be thrown into the sea, I would not wish any of you to have food for himself to exist on for a single day [if we should be defeated]. If you are people who will fight alongside me and endure the heat of battle, let me know this now; but if you will not do this, I shall fall upon this sword of mine until it comes out of my back, for I have no mind ever to let the Abyssinians gain power over me alive. So consider your position now, since I, your commander, have chosen this course for myself.” They responded, “Indeed, we will fight alongside you, until either we are dead to the last man or we are victorious!”

On the morn of the day when the truce ended, Wahriz arranged his troops for the fight, with the sea at their rear. He went up to them and exhorted them forcefully to remain steadfast in battle, and told them that they had two possible ways forward: either to be victorious over their enemy or to die gloriously. He ordered them to have their bows bent and strung, and said, “When I give you the order to shoot, let fly at them swiftly with a five-arrow volley [bi-al-banjakan].” The people of Yemen had never seen

600. This seems to be the meaning here, since Persian panj, “five,” is clearly an element of the word, presumably panjgân, “five-fold,” in origin. It is presumably related to the banjakiyah of al-Jawâliqî, al-Mu’arrab, 71: a volley of five arrows, mentioned in a context which speaks of the Khurâsâniyân. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 81 n. 7, less plausibly interprets banjakân as referring to five-pointed or five-barbed arrows (“fünfsackige [Pfeile]”).
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

war arrows before this occasion. Masrūq advanced with a host that appeared limitless, on an elephant, wearing a crown on his head and with a ruby the size of an egg on his forehead; he could not conceive the possibility of anything except victory. Wahriz’s sight had become poor through old age, and he said, “Show me their leader.” He was informed, “It’s the man on the elephant,” but then very soon afterward Masrūq got down from the elephant and mounted a horse. So they exclaimed, “He’s now mounted a horse.” Wahriz said, “Prop open my eyelids”—they had fallen down over his eyes on account of his age—so they held them up with a bandage. He then took out an arrow, placed it in the center of his bow and said, “Point out for me Masrūq.” They did that for him, until Wahriz was sure of him, and then he gave the order “Shoot!” He himself pulled on his bow until, when he had drawn it to its utmost, he released the arrow. It sped forward as if it were a tightly stretched rope, and struck Masrūq’s forehead. He fell from his mount. A great number of men were killed by that rain of arrows. When they saw their commander felled to the ground, their front rank crumbled, and there was nothing for it but flight.

Wahriz immediately gave orders for the burial of his son’s corpse, and ordered that Masrūq’s corpse be thrown down in its place. Booty was found in the defeated army’s encampment in quantities beyond measure and beyond enumeration. Each individual Persian cavalryman got fifty or sixty Abyssinians, Himyarites, or Bedouin as captives, and drove them along, unsustaining, before him in bonds. Wahriz said, “Leave the Himyarites and Bedouin alone, just hunt down the blacks and don’t leave a single one alive.” The Abyssinians were massacred on that day until not a single one of their host remained. A Bedouin managed to flee on his camel and galloped onward day and night. Then he happened to turn round and saw an arrow stuck in his provision bag behind the saddle. He exclaimed, “The devil take it! (literally, “Woe to your mother!”)—has it traversed such a wide distance or traveled so far!" He thought that the arrow had caught up with him!

602. For the technical term kabid al-qaws (kabid, literally “liver” “center, heart of a thing”), see J. D. Latham and W. F. Paterson, Saracen Archery, 161, 184: exactly, “the point the arrow passes when shot,” i.e., the arrow pass.

Wahriz advanced until he entered Ṣanʿāʾ and reduced to submission the whole land of Yemen. He sent out governors to the provincial districts (makḥālīf). Abū al-Ṣalt, the father of Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt al-Thagafi,603 says concerning the son of Dhū Yazan, his adventures, and those of Wahriz and the Persians, the following verses:

Let those who are like the son of Dhū Yazan seek vengeance, a man who spent several years traveling across the seas on account of his enemies.

He came to Heraclius, at a time when his enemies were already falling into discord and perturbation, but he did not secure from him any part of what he sought.

Then after seven years he turned toward Kisrā; how far away did you have to travel!

Until at last he brought with him the Free Ones (Banū al-Ahrār, i.e., the Persians),604 whom he bore along; by my life, you spent long in strenuous activity!

603. Ibn Hishām’s scholion to Ibn Ishāq’s text here, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 44 = ed. al-Saqā et al., I, 67–68, tr. 698, states that some authorities ascribe the poetry to the son Umayyah, who was a contemporary of the Prophet but, on account of the links between al-Ṭāʾif and Quraysh, was a supporter of Muḥammad’s opponents; he seems to have been dead by the time of the jahān, the conquest of Mecca, in 8/630. See Sharḥ dīwan Umayyah, 65; al-Hadithi, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, ḥayātuhu wa-shiʿruhu, 344 n. 158; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 304–306; Sezgin, GAS, II, 298–300, IX, 277, EP, s.v. Umayya b. Abī ʾl-Ṣalt (J. E. Montgomery).

Ibn Hishām’s text has for the name Hiraql in v. 2 the more general Qaṣṭar, “emperor,” and if this is the older and better reading, it would point to the poem’s being either contemporaneous with the events described or at least written not long afterward, by Abū al-Ṣalt rather than by his son Umayyah. If the reading Hiraql should be correct, then the poem would date from at least one or two generations after the events, since Heraclius reigned 610–41. The reading Hiraql would certainly appear to predate al-Ṭabarī, since it is the one found in the Kitāb al-shiʿr wa-al-shuʿārāʾ, 281, of Ibn Qutaybah (d. 276/889), repeated also in al-Azraqi, Akhbaṣ Makkah, 99.

604. Banū al-aḥrār is a frequent designation in early Arabic usage for the Persians encountered by them along the borders of Iraq and Persia, e.g., at the engagements of Dhū Qār [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1036, p. 367 below] and al-Qadisiyyah. We find the equivalent eleutheroi used by Josephus for the Parthians as the equivalent of the social-military Persian term underlaying the Arabic expression, i.e., āzādhaqāna [in origin, Avestan āzāta- “agnate, born into a clan” “freeman [as opposed to a slave]” and, in a narrower sense, “noble,” “free”], Who is like Kiṣrā, the supreme king (shahanshāh) over the dependent kings, or like Wahrīz on the day of the army, when he attacked furiously!

What a remarkable band went forth! You will never see among men their likes again!

Outstanding warriors, noble chiefs, gleaming ones, marzbāns, lions who train their cubs in the thickets,
Who shoot from highly bent bows, as if they were camel saddles, with long, slim arrows which bring the one who is hit to a speedy death.

You loosed lions against black dogs, and their scattered fugitives have spread through the land in full flight.

So drink with full peace of mind, wearing your crown and reclining high on Ghumdān in a house which you have made [once more] frequented.

Indulge freely in the use of musk, for they (i.e., your enemies) are in complete disarray, and on this day let your two luxurious robes trail freely!

These are noble deeds! Not two wooden bowls of milk mingled with water, which subsequently turned to urine.\textsuperscript{605}
The story returns to the narrative of Ibn Ishaq.

He related: Wahriz went back to Kisra, having appointed Sayf as king of Yemen. The latter now fell upon the Abyssinians and began to kill them, ripping open the pregnant womenfolk to tear out the fetuses, until he had exterminated the Abyssinians, apart from an insignificant, wretched few whom he took into his service as slaves. Some of these he employed as runners to go before him with their spears. Sayf carried on thus only for a short while before he went forth one day, with the Abyssinians running before him with their spears, until suddenly he found himself surrounded by them, and they attacked him with their spears, killing him. One of the Abyssinians assumed power over them, and carried out a policy of killing the Yemenis, creating havoc and wreaking all manner of evil. When news of this reached Kisra, he dispatched Wahriz against them with four thousand Persian troops and ordered him not to leave alive in Yemen a single black, nor the child of an Arab woman by a black, whether young or old, nor to leave alive a single man with crisp and curly hair in whose generation the blacks had been involved. Wahriz advanced until he entered Yemen, and did all that, killing every Abyssinian he could find. Then he wrote to Kisra informing him of what he had done. Kisra appointed him as viceroy over Yemen. He ruled over it, and levied taxation on it for Kisra until he died.606

After him, Kisra made his son al-Marzubān, son of Wahriz, vice-roy, who governed the land until he died. Then Kisra appointed al-

---

606. According to al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 64, Wahriz governed Yemen for five years. On his deathbed, he shot an arrow, which fell at the spot where his tomb was to be, “to this day,” says the historian, “the place is called the maqbarat Wahriz.” This same tale is given later by al-Ṭabarī, I, 988, p. 294 below, as part of Ibn al-Kalbi’s narrative.
Binajân (?), son of al-Marzubân, son of Wahriz, until he also died. Then Kisrâ appointed after him Khurrakhusrah, son of al-Binajân, son of al-Marzubân, son of Wahriz. The latter governed Yemen, but then Kisrâ grew angry with him and swore that the Yemenis should bring Khurrakhusrah to him at his court borne on their shoulders. This they did. When Khurrakhusrah came before Kisrâ, one of the Persian great men went right up to him and laid across him a sword that belonged to Kisrâ's father. Kisrâ therefore granted him security from being killed, but dismissed him from his post and sent Bâdhân to Yemen [as governor] instead. Bâdhân remained in that office until the time when God sent His Messenger Muḥammad.

[Resumption of the History of Kisrâ Anūsharwân]

It is related that there was a peace accord and a truce between Kisrâ Anūsharwân and Yakhtīyânūs (Justinian), king Byzantines. Discord and enmity arose between a man of the Arabs called Khâlid b. Jabalah, whom Yakhtīyânūs had appointed over the 607. In Ibn al-Kalbi's version of these events, i.e., in al-Ṭabarî, I, 988, p. 294, and cf. n. 693 below, al-Marzubân appears as al-M.r.w.zân, a better reading, probably to be vocalized as al-Maruzân. Likewise, al-Binajân appears as Z.y.n, perhaps for W.y.n, according to the suggestion of Marquart in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXXII, whereas Nöldeke thought it more likely that this consonant ductus contained the names of two persons, W.y.n and W.y.n.jân. But in the version of Ibn Ishâq at I, 958 n. d, Nöldeke adduced the name of a commander mentioned by the contemporary Byzantine historian Menander Protector, one Binganes.

---

608. The Kisrâ in question must be, of course, Khusraw II Abarwēz (r. 591-628).

609. Perhaps originally Bâdhâm, in which case the etymology would be presumably from bâdām, "almond." The name is in fact attested in Middle Persian as w'd'm. See Justi, Namenbuch, 56, connecting it with NP bād, Avestan vāta-, the spirit of the wind; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 914; E2 Suppl., s.v. Bâdham, Bâdhân (C. E. Bosworth).

610. This marks the end of this extended section on the history of Yemen, and the narrative now resumes from Persian sources as a parallel to that already given by al-Ṭabarî at I, 898-99, pp. 157-59 above.

611. That is, the Jafnid/Ghassanid ruler, the greatest of his line, correctly, al-Ḥârith b. Jabalah or Arethas (r. 529-69). [Nöldeke, trans. 238 nn. 2-3, pointed out that al-Ṭabarî's form Khalid arises from the ambiguities of the Pahlavi script, as does the kh for st in Yakhtīyânūs = Justinian, showing that al-Ṭabarî's ultimate source here must have been a Persian one.] Al-Ḥârith was a redoubtable foederatus or ally of the Byzantines, stemming as he did from a fervently Christian, albeit Monophysite, Arab family. He fought at the side of the Greeks in two major wars,
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

Arabs of Syria, and a man from Lakhm called al-Mundhir b. al-Nu‘mān, whom Kisrā had appointed over the lands extending from 'Uman, al-Bahrayn and al-Yamāmah to al-Ṭā‘īf and the rest of Ḥijāz and all the Arabs of the intervening lands. Khalid b. Jabalah raided al-Mundhir’ s territory and wrought great slaughter among his subjects and seized as plunder extensive lands of his. Al-Mundhir laid a complaint about this before Kisrā, and asked him to write to the king of the Byzantines requesting the latter to secure justice for him against Khalid. Kisrā therefore wrote to Yakhtiyānūs mentioning the agreement regarding the truce and peace between the two sides and informing him of what al-Mundhir, his governor over the Arabs [within the Persian sphere of influence], had suffered at the hands of Khalid b. Jabalah, whom Yakhtiyānūs had appointed governor over the Arabs within his dominions. He further asked him to command Khalid to return all the plunder he had driven off from al-Mundhir’ s territory and lands and [to command Khalid] to hand over the blood price for the Arabs whom he had killed and who were in al-Mundhir’ s jurisdiction and to furnish justice to al-Mundhir against Khalid. Yakhtiyānūs was not to treat what Kisrā had written lightheartedly and contemptuously; [if he were to do so, ] then this would be the cause of the rupturing of the agreement and truce between them. Kisrā sent a stream of letters to Yakhtiyānūs urging him to furnish justice to al-Mundhir, but Yakhtiyānūs paid no heed.

Hence Kisrā got ready his forces and led an expedition of some ninety thousand warriors against Yakhtiyānūs’ s lands. He cap-including at the battle of Callinicum [the Arabic al-Raqqah] in 531, and himself defeated and in 554 killed the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III at the battle of al-Hiyār at Chalcis [the Arabic Qinnasrin] [possibly the yawm Ḥalimah—Halimah being al-Ḥārith’s daughter—of the Arabic ayyām al-‘Arab literature], a decisive victory not merely as an intra-Arab clash but an event which gave the Ghassānids the preponderance over the Lakhmids for a long time to come. See on al-Ḥārith and the battle of Chalcis, Nöldeke, Die Ghassānidische Fürsten, 17–19; Rothstein, Lajmiden, 83–87; Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, 1/1, 63–82, 134ff., 236–66; EP2, s.vv. Ghassān and al-Ḥārith b. Djabala [I. Shahid].

612. That is, al-Mundhir III, who played this leading rôle in the extension of Persian power into eastern and central Arabia and, indeed, as far as Ḥijāz. See nn. 409, 563 above.

613. This is the renewed, second war of the Persian emperor with Justinian, spanning 540–45, with the campaign against Antioch already described at 1, 898, p. 157 and nn. 398–99 above. The events in question form the very detailed narrative
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

tured by force of arms the towns of Dārā, al-Ruḥā (Edessa), Manbij, Qinnasrīn, Aleppo, Antioch (which was the finest town in Syria), Fāmiyāh (Apamea), Ḥims (Homs), and numerous other towns in the neighborhood of these towns,614 he appropriated all the wealth (or: beasts, al-amwāl) and moveable goods in them; and he took captive all the inhabitants of Antioch, deported them to the Sawād, and gave orders for a town to be built for them at the side of Ctesiphon exactly on the pattern of the original Antioch, as I have already mentioned previously. He resettled the people of Antioch there; this is the town called al-Rūmiyyah. He erected this district into an administrative division (kūrah), which was to comprise four subdistricts (tassūjīs): that of Upper Nahrawān, that of Lower Nahrawān, that of Bādarāyā, and that of Bākusāyā.615 He allotted of Procopius in the later part of Book I and then Book II of The Persian War, in which the historian highlights the deeds of the general Belisarius, first appointed Magister Militum per Orientem in 529 and whom Procopius himself served as symboulos, i.e., as legal adviser and secretary. See Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 8, 157–70.

614. Of these towns of Upper Jazīrah and northern and central Syria, Nöldeke, trans. 239 n. 2 noted that Aleppo, Antioch, and Apamea [situated on the Orontes, to the northwest of Hamāt: see Yaqūt, Buldān, I, 227; Le Strange, Palestine, 384–85; EP, s.v. Afāmiya [H. A. R. Gibb] were conquered by the force of Persian arms, while Daras/Dārā [see for this n. 398 above], Edessa, Manbij [the classical Hierapolis, an important military post commanding crossings of the upper Euphrates: see Yaqūt, op. cit., V, 205–207; Le Strange, op. cit., 107; EP, s.v. Manbij [N. Elissēff]], and Qinnasrīn [the classical Chalcis to the south of Aleppo: see Yaqūt, op. cit., IV, 403–404; Le Strange, Palestine, 486–87; EP, s.v. Kinnasrin [Elissēff]] purchased their safety from the Persians by handing over substantial indemnities. Emesa or Ḥims also suffered badly.

615. Nahrawān was the district containing an extensive canal system to the east of the Tigris and in the region of the lower Diyālā river, with its center at the town of Nahrawān, which lay to the northeast of where the later Baghdad was to be situated. The canal system doubtless dates in some form from ancient times, but Khusrwān Anūsharwān developed it extensively and caused to be dug a lengthy feeder channel, al-Qāṭūl al-Kisrawī, "the Imperial cut," from the Tigris near the later Sāmarṟā to the Diyālā below Baʿqūbā. At various places, there were shādhurwāns or weirs [see for these, n. 94 above] dating from Sāsānīd times. The kūrah mentioned here was one created with the city of Weh-Antioch-i Khusrwj/ Rūmiyyah where the people deported from Antioch in Syria were settled ca. 540. The Arabic sources actually list five tassūjīs of the Nahrawān kūrah, the additional one being that of Middle Nahrawān. Bādarāyā and Bākusāyā [Aramaic Bēth Darāyā and Bēth Kosāyā] formed the region of Bandanīm, stretching from the east of Nahrawān to the fringes of the Zagros range and the border with the province of Media or Jībd. See Yaqūt, Buldān, I, 317–18, 327, V, 324–27; Le Strange, Lands, 57–61; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 245–49; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Con-
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

living allowances for the people whom he had transported from Antioch to al-Rūmīyyah, and appointed as overseer of their affairs a man from the Christian community of Ahwāz called Baraz,\(^{616}\) whom he had earlier made head of the the artisans and craftsmen working for him. This Kisra did out of tenderness and sympathy for those captives, and also with the administrative aim of causing them to feel at home with Baraz, because he was their coreligionist, and making them regard him with trust. As for the remainder of the towns of Syria and Egypt,\(^{617}\) Yakhtiyānūs bought Kisra off from them with a very large sum, which he handed over to the Persian king, and he undertook to pay ransom money to him each year in return for Kisra's undertaking not to raid his lands. He wrote for Kisra a document enshrining these terms, which he and the Byzantine great men of state sealed officially. They accordingly paid this sum annually.\(^{618}\)

The rulers of Persia before Kisra Anūsharwān used to levy land tax \(kharaj\) on the administrative divisions \(kuwar\), a third or quarter or fifth or sixth \[of their produce\], according to the water supply and the degree of cultivation; and poll tax \(jizyat al-jamājīm\) according to a fixed sum.\(^{619}\) King Qubād, son of Fayruz

---

\(^{616}\) As explained in n. 393 above, this is the New Persian form of MP Waraz, etc., meaning literally “boar, wild boar,” an animal admired for its strength and tenacity; see on it the references in that note.

\(^{617}\) Again, as in al-Ṭabarī, I, 898, p. 158 above, a confusion with the campaign early in the seventh century of Khusraw II Abarwēz.

\(^{618}\) Nöldeke, trans. 240 n. 4, noted that al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbar al-liwll, 69, names a certain Sharwin of Dastabā as wakil or overseer of payment of the tribute, but that there is uncertainty in other sources regarding this personage.

\(^{619}\) Since \(jumjumah\) means “skull,” its plural use in \(jizyat al-jamājīmah\) conveys literally the idea of a poll tax. Al-Khwārazmī, Mafāṭīh al-‘ulūm, 58, equates \(māl al-jamājīm\) with \(māl al-jawālī\), that money paid in the first place by non-Muslims expelled from the Arabian peninsula by the caliph ’Umar I but then applied to all Dhimmīs, “Protected peoples,” liable to poll tax, whether émigrés or not; see Bosworth, “Abū Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary’s Art,” 132. It has been known for some time, including from Talmudic references to it, that the Sāsānids levied a poll tax \(karga, karāga\) as well as a land tax \(ṭasqād\) and a further land tax \(māndōtā de malkā, “the king’s share”\); different from the \(ṭasqāl\), but much remains obscure about this fiscal system. See Grignaschi, “La riforma tributaria di Ḥosro I e il feudalesimo sassanide,” 113–15; Rubin, “The Reforms of Khusro Anūshirwān,” 231–32. Whether there was any continuity between this Sāsānīd poll tax and the early Islamic \(jizyah\) on the Dhimmi, is unclear; it may have been just one among several contributory strands in ordered, toward the end of his reign, a cadastral survey (mash alard), comprising plains and mountains alike, so that the correct amount of land tax could be levied on the lands.620 This was carried out, except that Qubâdh's death supervened before that survey could be completed. Hence when his son Kislâ succeeded to power, he gave orders for it to be carried through to its end and for an enumeration to be made of date palms, olive trees, and heads (i.e., of those liable to the poll tax). He then ordered his secretaries to calculate the grand total of that, and he issued a general summons to the people. He commanded the secretary responsible for the land tax to read out to them the total tax liabilities from the land and the numbers of date palms, olive trees, and heads. The secretary read all this out to them, after which Kislâ said to them, "We have judged it advisable to establish the rates of taxation (waḍāʾi) on the basis of what has been enumerated of the various jarībs of this cadastral survey621—date palms, olive trees, and heads—and we ordain that the taxation should be paid in installments spread over the year, in three installments. In this way, sums of money will be stored in our treasuries so that, should any emergency arise along one of our vulnerable frontiers or on any one of our distant boundaries, a breach of the borders or anything else untoward, and we have a need to deal with it and to nip it in the bud, involving the expenditure of money on this, we shall have money stored up here, ready and to the emergence of this Islamic tax. See Nöldeke, trans. 241 n. 1; Løkkegaard, Islami-cic Taxation in the Classic Period, 15, 132, 141.

620. Such surveys were frequently used by later, Islamic rulers as the bases for new tax assessments, involving the assessment of growing crops (takhmī̄n) and the sharing out of the harvested crop between the tax collector and the cultivator (muqāsamaḥ), the technique of surveying being called misāḥaḥ. See EP, s.vv.
Kânûn, ii. Cadaster (C. Cahen), Kharādīj, i. In the Central and Western Islamic Lands (Cahen) and Misāḥa, i. In the Central Islamic Lands (C. E. Bosworth).

621. Al-Khwārazmi, Mafāṭīḥ al-ʿulūm, 66, 67, tr. in Bosworth, "Abû ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmi on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 148–49, states that the jarīb was a measurement of surface area equaling thirty-six hundred square dhīra's or cubits, although of a fluctuating equivalence in Khurāsān. The jarīb was, in fact, the basic measurement for area in early Islamic times, still in use today in Persia, officially equaling one hectare, as well as being a measure of capacity for grain, etc., but in origin it was the amount of agricultural land which could be sown with a jarīb's measure of grain. See Nöldeke, trans. 242 n. 2; EP, s.v. Misāḥa. 1.
hand, since we do not wish to have to levy a fresh installment of taxation for that emergency. So what do you think about the procedure we have envisaged and agreed upon?"

None of those present offered him any further advice or uttered a single word. Kisrā repeated these words to them three times. Then a man stood up from out of the expanse of persons present and said to Kisrā, "O king—may God grant you long life!—are you establishing a perpetual basis for this land tax on transient foundations: a vine that may die, land sown with corn that may wither, a water channel that may dry up, and a spring or qanāt whose water supply may be cut off?" Kisrā replied, "O troublesome, ill-omened fellow, what class of people do you come from?" The man said, "I am one of the secretaries." Kisrā gave orders, "Have him beaten with ink holders (al-dawd) until he dies." Hence the secretaries in particular beat him with their ink holders, seeking to disassociate themselves, in Kisrā's eyes, from the man's views and utterance, until they killed him. The people said, "O king, we are in full agreement with the land tax which you are imposing on us."

Kisrā chose some men of sound judgment and wise counsel, and ordered them to investigate the various types of crops the cadastral survey had revealed for him, the numbers of date palms and olive trees, and the numbers of heads of those liable for the poll tax. On that basis, they were to fix the rates of taxation by the yardsticks of what they perceived would ensure the well-being of his subjects and ample means of sustenance for them. They were to report the results of this to him. Each man of them now spoke, according to the measure of his perception, regarding those rates of taxation which were to be fixed. They discussed the matter among themselves at length, and finally agreed to base the land tax on the products that maintained alive men and beasts, these being: wheat, barley, rice, grapes, trefoil and clover (ritāb), date

622. These would be ink holders of what later became the typical Islamic pattern, with a heavy head to hold the actual ink and with a handle. This secretary courageous enough to protest against Khusraw's measures is making the point adumbrated in n. 624 below: that fixed rate taxes will leave the cultivator at the mercy of crop failures or natural disasters, which will make him unable to find the money demanded.

623. As Nöldeke, trans. 244 n. 1, notes, al-Mas'ūdī in his Murūj, II, 204–205 = § 627, specifies that Anūsharwān's land-tax measures were only for Iraq, the richest palms, and olive trees. They fixed the land tax rate for every jarib of land planted with trefoil and clover, seven dirhams; on every four Persian date palms, one dirham; on every six date palms of lesser quality (daqal), the same figure; and every six olive tree stacks, the same figure. They only levied tax on date palms planted in enclosures or grouped together, not those growing as isolated trees. Everything apart from these seven types of crops from the earth they left tax free, and the people were to have a satisfactory standard of life from them.624 province of the empire. He also explains the stress on the annual fodder plants trefoil and clover (ratbāh, pl. ritāb = Persian aspīst) from the outstanding importance of horses in an army composed essentially of cavalrymen.
Holders of Power after Ardashīr b. Bābak

624. This land-tax reform was really begun by Kawād I but completed by Khosrau Anūsharwān. Previously, the land tax had been proportional to the harvest, but this basis, though apparently fair, had the disadvantage that the cultivators' harvested crop might rot before the state's assessor could arrive and extract the ruler's share. Hence a fixed unit of the land, the jarib, was now taken as the basis for assessment, and from the ruler's point of view, such a reform was highly advantageous since it gave promise of a fixed and predictable income from taxation. It was, however, less advantageous to the cultivator (despite what could be said, as noted above, about the possibility of the crop rotting or failing before the state's assessor arrived). Whatever the yield from his crops, he was obliged to pay the fixed sum stipulated, might have to sell his harvest at a time of glut and low prices, or borrow money at excessive interest, and could thus be left either starving or burdened with debt. See D. C. Dennett, Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 14–15; Lekkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 110, 117, 119; Crone, “Kavād’s Heresy and Mazdak’s Revolt,” 33–34.

The topic of Anūsharwān’s land-tax reforms, involving such questions as the stimulus for them (did the Mazdakite movement play any rôle here?), the precise nature of the reforms, and their social effects, has been long recognized as a crucial episode in Sāsānīd history, one with repercussions that continued into the early Islamic period for the land and fiscal systems in the Persian lands and Iraq.

Al-Tabari’s account is basic, and is largely corroborated by the poetic one in Firdawsi’s Shāh-nāmah, the ultimate source must have been the Khwadāy-nāmag, as also for al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-ťiwāl, 71–72, in his parallel section on the land tax in the time of Anūsharwān. But the Italian scholar Mario Grignaschi has, in a series of publications, drawn attention to several other little-known but relevant sources. These include the anonymous Nihāyat al-arab fi akhbār l-Furs wa-l-‘Arab, in the past attributed to the philologist al-‘Asma’ī but in fact by some unknown author of the third/ninth century, still substantially unpublished (but see below), and rejected by Nöldeke, trans. 475–76, as an inferior version of al-Dinawarī’s Long Histories. See Grignaschi, “La Nihāyat l-arab fi aḥbārī-l-Furs wa-l-‘Arab [première partie],” 15–67; idem, “La Nihāyat l-arab fi aḥbārī-l-Furs wa-l-‘Arab et les Siyaru mulūki l-Ağam du Ps. Ibn al-Muqaffa*,” 83–102. There is further a Sirat Anūshīrwan, which claims to be the emperor’s autobiography and which is preserved within the text of the Buyid historian Mis-
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

They imposed the poll tax on everyone except for people from noble families, great men, warriors, hērbadhs, secretaries, and those in the king’s service, and made them liable for it according to four levels, of twelve, eight, six, and four dirhams according to the richness or poverty of the person in question.625 The poll tax

Grignaschi used these sources in his closely argued article “La riforma tributaria di Ḥosrō I e il feudalesimo sassanide,” 87–138, to which he appended the texts of relevant extracts from the above-mentioned Sirat Anūshirwān and the Nihāyat al-ʿarab bearing on Khusraw’s reforms. The topic has been recently subjected to a thoroughgoing analysis by Zeev Rubin in his “The Reforms of Khusrō Anūshirwān,” 227–97. Rubin compares the relevant sections of al-Ṭabari, the Nihāyah, and al-Dinawari and notes that the account of the Nihayah is perceptibly less favorable to Khusraw than al-Ṭabari’s: instead of the vigorous, single-minded monarch of the latter historian, the Nihāyah’s Khusraw emerges as a somewhat hesitant person who has to explain and justify his proposed reforms. All three accounts nevertheless seem to go back to a common tradition put together in early ‘Abbāsid times within Shuʿubi circles. The social and political chaos of the decades before Khusraw’s accession were obviously a stimulus for the fiscal reforms begun by Kawād and carried through by his son. Rubin also avers that we should examine the reforms against the background of the general economic situation of the Sāsānid state. First, it benefited from the commerce of the Orient, which had largely to pass through its territories or through Indian Ocean and Arabian Sea waters which the Persian could control en route for the Mediterranean world. Nor were the financial subsidies that the Byzantine empire had to pay as the price of peace in the Near East negligible contributions to the economic health of Persia. Second, the fiscal reforms should be considered together with Khusraw’s military reforms, already examined by Geo Widengren as part of his general survey of the Persian army as a feudal force from Achaemenid to Sāsānid times (see his “Recherches sur le féodalisme iranien,” 15 2–74.

There is also particular detail on military affairs in the Sirat Anushirwān, see Grignaschi, “Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d’Istanbul,” 20–21. Despite the envisaged rise in revenue yields envisaged by the reforms, there does not seem ever to have been enough money available to finance a large, professional army of mailed cavalrymen directly recruited and paid by the monarch and freeing him from dependence on the military services of the great noble families of Persia and their retinues. Hence there seems to have evolved the practice of bringing in manpower from non-Persian, mercenary sources, such as Turks and Hephthalites from Central Asia and Bactria, Daylamis from the Elburz mountain region, and Arabs from the desert fringes of Iraq. Khusraw was here continuing a process already begun under Kawād, who had regained his throne and been kept in power by the backing of Hephthalite mercenaries, links with the Hephthalites having been forged during his enforced exile within their lands in the 490s.

Finally, the course and development of Khusraw’s fiscal system are briefly touched upon by Rubin. The system must have changed even within the course of his long reign, and was already showing signs of decay by the end of that time. The was not to be levied on those below twenty or above fifty years of age. They brought their tax assessments before Kisrā; he approved them and ordered them to be put into force and for tax collecting to be done on their basis annually, in three installments each of four months. These he called 'b.rās.yār (?), meaning "an arrangement mutually agreed upon by all." It was these tax assessments 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb followed when he conquered the Persian lands and levied taxation on the "protected peoples" (ahl al-dhimmah) there, except that he levied taxation on every uncultivated (ghāmir) piece of land according to its potential yield, at the same rate as he levied on sown land. Also, he levied on every jarīb of land growing wheat or barley from one to two additional qaḍīzs control system of the provincial judges, in fact district mūbadhs of the Zoroastrian state church [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 963, p. 261 below] probably proved no less susceptible to corrupt practices than any other officials in a similar situation. Under Khusraw's son and successor Hormizd IV, the great military families of the provinces gained excessive opportunities for exploiting the peasantry, and Rubin speculates that Hormizd's reputed violence against the military aristocracy [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 988–89, p. 295 below] may have been a desperate attempt to stem corruption and oppression and to salvage something of Khusraw's system. The cataclysmic events toward the end of Khusraw II Abarwez's reign must have plunged the system into deeper malfunction. It nevertheless survived intact enough to be taken over by the Muslims when they overran Iraq and Persia, basically as the misāḥah system, but was at least in part converted into muqāṣāmah in the early 'Abbāsid period, a reversion to the system before the reforms of Kawād and Anūsharwān. See Lekkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 109–13.

625. The poll tax [see n. 619 above] had previously been a fixed sum that the assessors and collectors had had to divide out as best they could. The exemptions for the royal family, aristocracy, soldiers [al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 71, specifies here marāzibah and asāwirah [al-Ṭabarī has, less specifically, for these two classes 'uzāmā and muqāṭīlah] and kuttāb], secretaries, and the Zoroastrian priests increased their position as privileged castes. While the tax liabilities of the middle and lower classes were theoretically meant to compensate for the royal service and religious duties that they were unable to perform, in practice, payment of these taxes amounted to an acknowledgment of social inferiority. As mentioned in n. 619 above, the existence of this Sāsānīd institution may have been a contributory factor when the nascent Islamic state evolved the poll tax (jizyah) and applied it to the Dhimmis as a mark of their social and religious degradation and second-class citizenship compared with the Muslim Arabs, but this is speculative.

626. This term is wholly obscure. Al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 71, says that the warehouses where the three installments of collected produce were stored were called sarāy simarrāh [text, shīmarraḥ], i.e., "house for the three [sic] times [marrah] [of collection]"; cf. the loan word in Arabic samarāj or samaraj, see Asya Asbaghi, Persische Lehnwörter im Arabischen, 165: "Steuer in drei Stufen."
of wheat; this he used for feeding his army.\textsuperscript{627} But in the specific case of Iraq, 'Umar did not make any arrangements contrary to those of Kisrā regarding the jarībs of land and regarding the date palms, olive trees, and the heads [of those liable to the poll tax], and he excluded from liability to taxation the people's means of daily sustenance, as Kisrā had done.\textsuperscript{628}

Kisrā ordered the new tax assessments to be written down in several copies. One copy was to be kept in his own chancery close at his hand; one copy was sent to the land-tax collectors (ʿummāl al-kharāj) for them to collect taxation on its basis; and another copy was sent to the judges of the administrative divisions (quḍāt al-kuwar). The judges were charged with the duty of intervening between the tax collectors and the people if the tax collectors in the administrative districts attempted to raise an additional sum above the amount laid down in the master copy of the tax assessment in the chancery, of which they had received a copy. Also, the judges were to exempt from land tax those whose tillage or other tax-attracting produce had been damaged or badly affected in any way, according to the seriousness of that damage or defect. Regarding those persons liable for the poll tax who had died, or who had passed the age of fifty, collecting the taxation was likewise suspended; the judges were to write back to Kisrā about the tax exemptions here, which they had granted so that Kisrā might issue appropriate instructions to his tax collectors. Furthermore,

\textsuperscript{627.} As with the jarīb, the qaḍiz was a measure both of surface area (one-tenth of a jarīb, i.e., 360 square dhiri’s or cubits, according to al-Khwārizmī, \textit{Mafāṭīḥ al-ʿulūm}, 66) and also one of capacity (ibid. 67–68, giving the varying equivalences of the basically Iraqi qaḍiz for different parts of the Persian lands, where the \textit{manā} was the normal measure for capacity). See Nöldeke, trans. 346 n. 6; Bosworth, “Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārizmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary’s Art,” 148–50, citing information from W. Hinz, \textit{Islamische Masse und Gewichte umgerechnet ins metrische System}, 16–23.

\textsuperscript{628.} On ʿUmar’s \textit{misaḥah}, see Dennett, \textit{Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam}, 12ff., and Løkkegaard, \textit{Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period}, 119–20. Regarding ʿUmar’s procedure over the land tax, there are actually contradictory reports in the Arabic sources concerned with the postconquest Sawād of Iraq. Thus according to al-Māwarī, ʿUmar imposed on the Sawād a flat rate of one dirham and one qaḍiz of produce for the provisioning of the Arab warriors (but in other parts of Iraq, the rate varied according to the crop); but according to Abū Yūsuf, ʿUmar taxed land according to the crop grown there. In reality, the disparity only arises, suggested Dennett, because the two viewpoints reflect changes in ʿUmar’s prescriptions here.
the judges were not to let the tax collectors levy taxation on persons aged less than twenty.\textsuperscript{629}

Kisrā had appointed over the department of the warriors (\textit{dīwān al-muqāṭilah}) a man from the secretarial class who was outstanding for his noble birth, martial virtues, sufficiency, and capability, called Bābak, son of \textquoteleft l.y.r.wān (?).\textsuperscript{630} This last said to Kisrā, "My function cannot properly be carried out unless I have a free hand at putting into practice what seems best to me for the good conduct of the king's affairs in regard to his army." Kisrā granted Bābak this. Bābak now gave orders for the construction of a platform in the place where army reviews were customarily held, carpets from Sūsanjird and woolen rugs were laid on it, and cushions provided for him to lean back upon. He then took up his place on all those coverings.

Bābak's herald now proclaimed throughout those troops present in Kisrā's army camp that the cavalrymen were to present themselves before him for inspection on their mounts and with their weapons, and the infantrymen with their requisite weapons. The troops massed together in front of him in the manner Bābak had stipulated they were to parade, but he did not see Kisrā present in their ranks, so he told them to go back. His herald made the same proclamation on the next day, and the troops gathered round him again; but when he still could not discern Kisrā among them, he told them to go back and reappear before him next morning. He instructed his herald to proclaim on the third day, "Let no one present in the army camp lag behind, even if he is honored by possessing a crown and a throne," for Bābak had resolved that there should be no exception in his favor and no partiality shown to him (i.e., to Kisrā). The message reached Kisrā, and he placed the crown on his head, girded on the weapons of a soldier, and then went along to Bābak so that he might present himself for inspection by him.

The equipment that a cavalryman of the army had to take along with him comprised horse mail, soldier's mailed coat, breastplate, \textsuperscript{629.} These judges from the religious institution were presumably mōbadhs who administered the Zoroastrian church law; here they are charged with protecting the taxpayers from tyranny and exploitation by the taxcollectors.

\textsuperscript{630.} Nöldeke, trans. 247, though that this name might be Bîrawān (?); it is equally corruptly written in al-Dinawārî's passage on the Sāsānid army review, \textit{al-Akhbār al-†iwāl}, 72–73, as al-Nahrwān.
Holders of Power after Ardashir b. Bābak

leg armor plates, sword, lance, shield, mace, and, fastened at his waist, a girdle, battle axe, or club, a bow case containing two bows with their strings, thirty arrows, and finally, two plaited cords, which the rider let hang down his back from his helmet.631 Kisrā presented himself for inspection before Bābak with his weapons all complete except for the two cords he was supposed to tie on his back. Bābak did not pass over his name, but said to him, “O king, you are standing in such a place where all are treated equally, where no partiality on my part can be shown nor any relaxation! So step forward with all the requisite kinds of weapons!” At that point, Kisrā remembered the matter of the two cords, so he let them hang down.

Bābak’s herald now sang out in a loud voice, saying, “For the brave warrior, lord of brave warriors, four thousand and one dirhams,”632 and Bābak passed over his name. Then the king returned home. Now Bābak used to give the king a pay rate superior to that of the rest of the soldiers by one dirham. When Bābak got up from his seat [on the platform], he went to Kisrā and told him, “The lack of consideration that I showed you today, O king, was only so that the function with which you charged me could be thereby properly discharged, because the most secure way of achieving the king’s aim is his making my office as firmly based as possible.” Kisrā replied, “We don’t regard as any lack of consideration for us a procedure that I desire for the furtherance of the welfare of my subjects and by means of which the injury of an injured person may be set right.”633

631. Nöldeke, trans. 248 n. 2, noted that Firdawsi adds to the list the lassoo, characteristic of steppe-dwelling herdsmen, and mentioned by Herodotus, VII. 85, as a weapon of the Iranian tribe of the Sagartians, possibly to be located in northeastern Persia.

632. The “and one” is supplied from the parallel passage in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 73, as done by Nöldeke in trans. 249, cf. n. 1, and noted in text, n. e; without this amendment, the point made just afterward is lost.

633. Bābak’s rōle as head of the military department corresponds to that of the ḍariq who presided over the department of the army, diwān al-jaysh, diwān al-jund, in the ‘Abbāsid caliphate and the diwān al-arḍ in such successor states to it in the Persian lands as those of the Sāmānids, Ṣaffārids, Būyids, and Ghaznavids. The institution of regular inspections of troops was probably an ancient one in Persia. According to Widengren, in Achaemenid times, the Persian army had a rallying point, apparently termed the ḍandaiša- < ḍandez, corresponding to Xenophon’s exetasis, and there was a secretary, the rēš dupšari șa ٲɾ officers who fulfilled the rōle of Bābak here. From the evidence of the Babylonian Talmud, the Kisra now dispatched to Yemen an army under the command of a man from the people of Yemen called Sayf an. Ma‘di Karib—some authorities aver, however, that he was called Sayf an. Dhī Yazan—which killed the blacks there (i.e., the Abyssinians) and conquered the land.\(^{634}\) Having secured the submission of the land of Yemen, Kisra sent one of his commanders, with a numerous army, against Sarandib, the land of precious stones, in the land of India.\(^{635}\) The commander attacked its king, killed him, and seized control of it, sending back from there to Kisra abundant wealth and many jewels.

In the land of Persia there were no jackals (\(banāt āwā\)),\(^{636}\) but related term \(andesaq\) seems to have been used in Arsacid times. The account given here by al-Ţabari and also by al-Dinawari of the Sāsānīd army inspection is distinctly imaginative in its details, and can hardly be accepted as firm evidence for detailed Sāsānīd practice here. Yet it is likely that there was some department of the bureaucracy concerned with the army and its standard of effectiveness, and precampaign inspections of the Persian army, in the presence of the monarch and the commanders appointed to lead that expedition, are mentioned by Procopius [Christensen, \(Sassanid es, 213–14\)]. The \(Sirat Anūshirwān\) mentions these reviews held by the emperor, and says that they took place in the presence of the \(qā‘īd\) or commander, the \(pādghuspān\) or commander-in-chief of the force (the later \(ispahbadh\)), the \(qādī\) or judge, and a trusty secretary appointed directly by the king (\(āmin min qibalīnā\)). See Widengren, “Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien,” 152ff.; Grignaschi, “Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d’Istanbul,” 20 and n. 48.

For the Islamic period, we have a detailed account of the \(‘ard\) as practiced in the Šaffārid army under ‘Amr b. al-Layth [r. 265–87/879–900] in which the Amir, like Khusraw Anūsharwān, had to be inspected by the \(‘ard\) and passed fit for service just like every other soldier. The authority for this is al-Sallāmī, author of a lost history of the governors of Khurasān, cited in Ibn Khallikān’s \(Wafayāt al-a‘yān\). Ibn Khallikān juxtaposes this with al-Ţabari’s account of the Sāsānīd inspection in the time of Anūsharwān (actually cited via the historian of Aleppo Ibn al-‘Adim), and notes the similarity between the two procedures. A modern historian like Barthold observed that the resemblances could hardly be coincidental. See Ibn Khallikān, \(Wafayāt, VI, 421–23, tr. de Slane, IV, 322–24; W. Barthold, \(Turkestan Down to the Mongol Invasion\)\(^3, 221; Bosworth, “The Armies of the Šaffārides,” 549–50.\)

\(^{634}\) This seems to be a purely Persian piece of historical information, perhaps compressed by al-Ţabari because of its contradictions with the story of Wahriz’s South Arabian expedition given by him at considerable length in I, 952–58, p. 245–51 above. According to Noldeke, trans. 250 n. 1, we should correct the text’s Sayf an (which in Persian would mean “son of Sayf”) to Sayf b. Dhī Yazan.

\(^{635}\) Sarandib was the name given to the island of Ceylon in mediaeval Islamic geographical and historical literature; see \(EP, 8\)S Sarandib (C. E. Bosworth). It was famed in Islamic lore for its supposed wealth. The story of a Sāsānīd conquest of Ceylon is, of course, pure legend.

\(^{636}\) The jackal (\(canis aureus or anthus, in Persian, \(shaghal\)) is in fact widely distributed today in Persia. See Naval Intelligence Division, Admiralty Handbooks, \(Persia, 209–10.\) some of them infiltrated into Persia from the land of the Turks during the reign of Kiswa Anusharwan. News of this reached Kiswa, and caused him anguish. He summoned the Chief Mobadh and told him, “We have heard about the appearance of those wild beasts in our land, and it has distressed the people. We are, however, astonished that they consider such an insignificant occurrence as so portentous; tell us what you think about all this.” The Chief Mobadh replied, “O king—may God grant you long life—I have heard our scholars learned in the divine law say that, so long as justice does not overlay tyranny in a land and itself becomes obliterated, the people of that land will be afflicted by incursions of their enemies against them, and all sorts of unpleasant things will gradually come upon them. I have become afraid lest the infiltration of these wild beasts into your land is connected with what I have just told you.” Very soon afterward, the news reached Kiswa that a band of Turkish youths had raided the furthest boundaries of his land. He ordered his ministers and provincial governors not to go beyond what was just in the course of their official duties and not to act in any way during the course of those duties except justly. Because of this policy of acting justly, God deflected that enemy from Kiswa’s land without his having to make war on them or to undertake great trouble in repelling them.

Kiswa had several handsomely educated sons. From out of those, he appointed as his successor to the throne Hurmuz, whose mother was the daughter of Khatun and Khagan, because he knew Hurmuz to be a person who would act with circumspection and fidelity to his word, and because he hoped through this appointment that Hurmuz would keep the kingdom in order and would show strength in directing the government of the land and in ruling over the subjects and treating them suitably.

---

637. The story of an invasion of jackals into Iraq appears in al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭīwāl, 74, but with no mention of an incursion of Turkish youths; here, the depredations of the jackals are attributed to the existence of tyranny and injustice within Anusharwan’s lands, remedied by his appointing a commission of thirteen agents to enquire into the matter, as a result of which the king executed ninety evil officials pour décourager les autres. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 251 n. 1.

638. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 899, p. 160 above.

639. Anusharwan’s designation of Hormizd (IV) sprang no doubt from his mother’s royal birth. According to such sources as al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭīwāl, 74–75, and al-Ya’qubi, Ta’rīkh, I, 187, the king passed over his other sons because they had mothers of lowly origin and were only awlād sūqah, and chose Hormizd after
The birth of the Messenger of God took place during the reign of Kisrā Anūsharwān, in the year when Abrahah al-Ashram Abū Yakṣūm marched against Mecca with the Abyssinians, bringing with him the elephant, having the intention of demolishing the Holy House of God. It happened after forty-two years of Kisrā Anūsharwān’s reign had elapsed. In this same year also was the carefully observing his worthy behavior. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 252 n. 3.

640. This would make it the year 573. The question of the birth date of Muḥammad is unusually speculative and controversial. A key point is what al-Ṭabarī mentions here, i.e., the date of Abrahah’s expedition against Mecca in the “Year of the Elephant,” with which the Prophet’s birth date is held to coincide. But since the early Islamic historical tradition does not date this expedition, a date of 570 has been calculated backward from the fact that Muhammad’s first call to prophethood, the mabhath, fell approximately in 610 and from the saying that he was about forty years old when he received this call.

However, this date of 570, while repeated in many of the biographies of Muḥammad, is contradicted both by evidence outside the Islamic tradition, principally from what we know about South Arabian history in the mid-sixth century, and by some reports within the Islamic tradition, which give widely differing dates up to twenty years after the “Year of the Elephant.” Already more than 120 years ago, Nöldeke, trans. 204 n. 2, saw that the traditional dating was untenable, adding among other things Ibn al-Kalbī’s assertion that Muhammad’s birth was twenty-three years after Abrahah’s expedition [also in his Geschichte des Qorāns, I, 67–70]. Lamens pointed out that, if one takes ten years off the traditional birth date of 570, i.e., placing Muhammad’s birth in 580 so that he was fifty-two years old when he died, there is a correspondence with the date for the Prophet’s death given by Barhebraeus in his Mukhtāṣar Taʾrikh al-Duwal, ed. A. Șălihān, Beirut 1890, 160, i.e., 823 of the Seleucid era = A.D. 580 (unfortunately Barhebraeus does not say how he acquired this date); see Lamens, “L’âge de Mahomet et la chronologie de la Stra,” 239–40. Various Islamic traditions stating that Muhammad was not born in the “Year of the Elephant” have been listed by Kister, see n. 563 above. What we know of Abrahah’s policy in pushing his dominion northward from Yemen into Hijāż and central Arabia places his activities in the 550s, as attested by the well of Murayghān inscription from 552–53. Whether an attack on Mecca was part of the campaign of Abrahah to Ḥulubān or another campaign mounted into Hijāż shortly afterward is discussed in n. 563 above. All in all, it does not seem feasible to uphold the date of 570 as being that of the Prophet’s birth. Furthermore, L. I. Conrad, in a detailed discussion of the whole topic, has pointed out how little interested were the Arabs of north and central Arabia in questions of firm dating and chronology, seen in the vagueness and confusedness over the chronological order and relationship to each other of the ayyām al-ʿArab, the battles of the pre-Islamic Arabs. Hence the figure of forty years for Muḥammad’s life before his call to nubuwah—apart from the fact that “forty” is a literary topos in both ancient and mediaeval times for a number with connotations of perfection, completion, and culmination—must be regarded as a symbolic rather than a chronologically exact one. See his “Abraha and Muḥammad. Some Observations Apropos of Chronology and Literary Topoi in the Early Arabic Historical Tradition,” 225–40.
"Day of Jabalah," one of the celebrated "days" (i.e., battles) of the Arabs.641

641. Jabalah, an isolated mountain in Najd some 150 km/90 miles south of 'Unayzah [al-Bakri, Mu'jam ma' ista'jam, II, 365–66; Yaqút, Buldán, II, 104], was the scene of the yawm [shi'b] Jabalah or yawm al-Nuq between 'Amir b. Ṣa'sṣ'ah and 'Abs on one side, and Tamim, supported by Dhubyān, Asad, a contingent from al-Ḥirah and men of Kindah from the Āl Jawnah then ruling in Bahrayn (see n. 312 above), accounted as one of the most celebrated battles of the Arabs. 'Amir and their allies were victorious, and one result was the shattering of Kindā power in Najd [see Olinder, "Āl al-Ġaun of the Family of Ākil al-Murār," 214–25; because two members of the line of Jawn took part in the battle, the encounter is also known as the yawm al-Jawnayn]. The historical traditions vary concerning the date of the "Day of Jabalah"; some place it in the year of Muḥammad's birth, others seventeen or nineteen years before that. In reality, if the Lakhmid king who sent a contingent was, as the historical traditions say, al-Ġu'mūn (III) b. al-Mundhir (IV), then the date cannot be before 580, the year of his accession. See Caskel, Aijām al-'Arab. Studien zur altarabischen Ḥikā, 11, 34, 36–37, 62, translating at 95–97 part of the Naqā'īd jārī wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 654ff., describing the "Day"; EP, s.vv. Djabala [F. Buhl-R. L. Headley], Shi'b Djabala [I. Shahid].
Mention of the Birth of the Messenger of God

He related: ‘Uthmān b. ‘Affān asked Qubāth b. Ashyam, a member of the Banū ‘Amr b. Layth, “Who is the greater in build (akbar), you or the Messenger of God?” He replied, “The Messenger of God is greater in build than I, although I preceded him in date of birth (anā aqdam minhu fī al-mīlād); I saw the elephant’s dung, dark colored and reduced to a powdery form, one year after the beast’s appearance. I also saw Umayyah b. ‘Abd Shams as a very old man being led around by his slave.” His son said, “O Qubāth, you have the best knowledge; what do you say?”

There related to us Ibn Ḫumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq—al-Muṭṭalib b. ‘Abdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah—his father—his grandfather Qays b. Makhramah, who said: The Messenger of God and myself were born in the Year of the Elephant, and we were coevals of each other.

There was narrated to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God’s father, was born in the twenty-fourth year of Kūsrā Anūsharwān’s period of power, and the Messenger of God was born in the forty-second year of his period of power.642

642. That is, ‘Abdallāh would have been born, on this reckoning, in 555 and his son Muḥammad in 573.
I was informed by Yusuf b. Mu'in—Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—Sa‘īd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās, who said: The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant. I was informed by Ibrāhīm b. al-Mundhir—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Thābit—al-Zubayr b. Mūsā—Abū al-Ḥuwayrith, who said: I heard ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān say to Qubāth b. Ashyam al-Kinānī al-Laythī, O Qubāth, who is the greater in body, you or the Messenger of God?” He replied, “The Messenger of God was greater in body than me, but I am older than him. The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant, and my mother stood with me by a pile of the elephant’s dung, when it was crumbling away to powder, at a time when I was nevertheless able to understand what it was.”

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishaq, who said: The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant, on Monday, the twelfth of the month of Rabi’ I. It is said that he was born in the house known as that of Ibn Yūsuf. It is further said that the Messenger of God gave this house to ʿAqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, who retained ownership of it until he died, when his son sold it to Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, brother of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. Muḥammad rebuilt the house called that of Ibn Yūsuf, and incorporated that new part into the house as a whole. Later, al-Khayzurān separated the new part from the house as a whole and made it into a mosque, which then came into use for public worship.643

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishaq, who said: Among what people relate is the assertion—but God is the most knowing [about the truth]—that ʿĀminah bt. Wahb, the Messenger of God’s mother, used to relate that when she became pregnant, people came to her and said, “You are bearing the lord of this community (sayyīd hāḍīhi al-ummah), and when he drops to the ground [from you], exclaim, ‘I seek refuge in the One God—from the evil of every envious one,’ and then name him Muḥammad.” When she was pregnant with him, she dreamed that there came forth from her a light, by which she could discern the for-

643. Muḥammad had made this house over to ʿAlī’s half-brother ʿAqīl b. Abī Ṭālib when he left Mecca on the Hijrah to Medina; with al-Khayzurān’s purchase of it, the house returned to the family of Ḥāshim. See al-Azraqī, Akhbar Makkah, 422; Nabia Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, Mother and Wife of Harūn al-Rashid, 118–19.
When she actually gave birth to him, she sent a message to the child’s grandfather 'Abd al-Mu'tṭalib: “A baby boy has been born for you, so come and see him.” He indeed came along and saw the child, and she told him about the dream she had had while pregnant with the child, what had been told her regarding him and what she had been commanded to call the child.

There related to us Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Ya'qūb b. Muḥammad al-Zuhrī—'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Imrān—'Abdallāh b. Aminah bt. Wahb b. 'Abd al-Manāf was from the Meccan clan of Zuhrah. Her apparently uxorilocal marriage with 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was ended by the latter’s premature death (see n. 662 below), and she herself died when Muḥammad was only six years old, leaving him to his paternal grandfather’s care. See EP, s.v. Amina [W. M. Watt]. Popular belief and lore in early Islam attributed various supernatural details to Aminah’s pregnancy and the birth of Muḥammad, including the story of the dream of divine radiance, “the light of prophethood,” the averring that she was bearing “the lord of this community,” and the remarkable ease of her giving birth to him, clean, with cut umbilical cord and circumcised, after which the infant placed his hands on the ground and gave thanks to heaven. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 102, 106 = ed. al-Saqqa et al., I, 166–67, 175, tr. 69, 72; Ibn Sa’d, Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, I/1, 60–61, 63–64. On the topic of Muḥammad’s being born circumcised and the fact that, according to some traditions, Muḥammad was only one of a series of prophets born circumcised, see Kister, “. . . . And he was born circumcised. . . . ’ Some Notes on Circumcision in Ḥadīth,” 10–30 and esp. 13–16.

Modern scholars have pointed out the resemblance of many of these details to the stories of the birth and early life of other great religious leaders. Thus the nār muḥammadī parallels the old Iranian idea of the divine fortune or glory of kings, xvaronah, MP farrah, NP farr (see n. 232 above), which manifested itself, according to the account in the Dēnkard, at the time of Zoroaster’s birth, and the light at the births of Krishna and the Buddha, while the announcement of Aminah’s forthcoming delivery of a child is like that of Mary glorying in her conception of Jesus in the Magnificat. See I. Goldziher, “Neuplatonische und gnostische Elemente im Ḥadīt,” 328–30; Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds, 28–33, 319–21; idem, Mohammed, sein Leben und Glaube, 28–29.
"Uthmān b. Abī Sulaymān b. Jubayr b. Muṭʿim—his father—Ibn Abī Suwayd al-Thaqafi—"Uthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ—his mother, who said that she was present at the Messenger of God's mother Āminah bt. Wahb's giving birth, this being during the night, and Āminah said, "What is this thing which I can see from the house, lighting everything up, and I can also see the stars drawing near me to such a point that I can say that they are falling on top of me."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq, who said: People assert that 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib picked up the child and took it along to Hubal,646 in the heart of the Ka'bah, and stood by him, praying to God and giving thanks for what He had vouchsafed him. Then he went forth with the child and handed him over to his mother. He sought out for the child foster mothers,647 and asked a woman to foster him, one from the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr called Ḥalīmāh bt. Abī Dhu'ayb, Abū Dhu'ayb being 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Shijnah b. Jābir b. Rizām b. Nāṣirah b. Quṣiyyah b. Sa'd b. Bakr b. Hawāzin b. Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimah b. Khaṣafah b. Qays b. 'Aylān b. Muḍār. The name of the Messenger of God's foster father was al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-'Uzza b. Rifaʿah b. Mallān b. Nāṣirah b. Quṣiyyah b. Sa'd b. Bakr b. Hawāzin b. Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimah b. Khaṣafah b. Qays b. 'Aylān b. Muḍār. The names of his foster brother and sisters were 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, and Unaysah bt. al-Ḥārith and Hudhāfah648 bt. al-Ḥārith, respectively. The latter was in practice called al-Shaymā',649 a name that prevailed over her proper name so that, among her people, she was known exclusively by it. [The mother of these foster siblings was] Ḥalīmah bt. ‘Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārīth, [foster] mother of the Messenger of God. It is asserted that al-Shaymā’ used to carry the Messenger of God in her bosom, as also did her own mother while the boy was in her care.\footnote{Halimah’s tribe Sa’d b. Bakr were part of the Hawāzin confederation, who lived in Ḥijāz in the vicinity of Mecca and al-Ṭā’īf. When women of Sa’d b. Bakr were captured by Muhammad on his defeat of Hawāzin at the battle of Ḥunayn in 8/630, he honored Halimah’s daughter al-Shaymā’ and responded favorably to appeals by the menfolk of the tribe on the basis of their foster relationship. See EI², s.vv. Ḥalima bint Abī Dhu’ayb and Sa’d b. Bakr [W. M. Watt].}

As for the report from an authority other than Ibn Ishaq, he relates concerning that: There related to me al-Ḥārīth—Ibn Sa’d—Muḥammad b. ‘Umar—Mūsā b. Shaybah—‘Umāyr b. ‘Ubaydah b. Ka’b b. Mālik—Barrah b. Abī Tujza’ah, who said: The first person who suckled the Messenger of God for a few days was Thuwaybah, with milk for a son of hers called Masrulh, before Ḥalīmah was put forward; she had previously suckled Ḥamzah b. ‘Abd al-Muṣṭalib, and after him she suckled Abū Salamah b. ‘Abd al-Asad al-Makhzūmī.

There related to us Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishaq, also Ḥanūd b. al-Sarī—Yūnus b. Bukayr—Ibn Ishaq, also Hārūn b. Idrīs al-Asāmm—al-Muḥāribī—Ibn Ishaq, also Sa’īd b. Yahyā al-Umāwī—his paternal uncle Muḥammad b. Sa’īd—Muḥammad b. Ishaq al-Jahm b. Abī al-Jahm, a mawlā of ‘Abdallāh b. Ja’far—‘Abdallāh b. Ja’far b. Abī Ṭālib, who said: Ḥalīmah b. Abī Ḥanīfa, the Messenger of God’s (foster) mother who suckled him, used to relate that she went forth from her land, accompanied by her husband and an infant son of hers whom she was nursing, with a group of women from the Banū Sa’d b. Bakr, seeking for babies whom they could foster. This was, she related, in a year of severe drought, which had left nothing. [She related:] I set out on a greyish-white she-ass of mine, together with an old she-camel which was not, by God, yielding a drop [of milk]. We could not sleep the whole night because of our child’s crying from hunger. There was nothing in my breasts to satisfy him, and nothing in our she-camel to provide him with nourishment, but we were hoping for rain and for relief.
I set off on that she-ass of mine, but through weakness and emaciation it was jaded, and lagged behind the rest of the group until that became an irritation for them. Finally, we reached Mecca, where we sought for children to foster. The Messenger of God was offered to every one of the women, but each one rejected him when told that he was an orphan, since we hoped for the customary payment from the child's father. We would say, "An orphan! And what are his mother and grandfather likely to do?" Hence for that reason we spurned him. Every woman in the group that had come with me had found a child to foster except myself. When we decided to depart, I said to my husband, "I dislike the idea of returning with my group of women companions without having taken a foster child; by God, I shall go back to that orphan and take him." My husband said, "You are free to do as you wish; perhaps God will send us a blessing on his account." She related: I took him up and brought him back to my traveling baggage. When I placed him in my bosom, my breasts immediately began to flow for him with all the milk he desired. He sucked until he was full up, as did also his (foster) brother. Then they both slept, whereas previously he had not been able to sleep. My husband arose and went to that old she-camel of ours and looked at it, and lo and behold, her udders were full. He milked it, and we both drank of the milk until we were finally refreshed and replete, and we passed a happy night. She related: When it was morning, my husband said to me, "By God, O Ḥalimah, do you realize that you have taken a blessed creature?" I replied, "By God, I hope so." She related: Then we set off. I rode that she-ass of mine and carried him with me, and by God, she went ahead through the party of riders so that none of their other male asses could keep up with it, to the point that my women companions were saying to me, "O Ibnat Abī Dhu‘ayb! Wait for us! Isn’t this she-ass of yours the one on which you started out?" and they commented, "By God, there is something extraordinary about it!" She related: We then reached our camping grounds in the country of the Banū Sa‘d; and I do not known any of God’s lands more barren than that. [She related:] When we had him with us, my flock used to come back to us in the evening satiated and full of milk. We would milk them and drink the milk, while other people could not draw a drop or find anything in their beasts’ udders, until those of our tribes who had fixed dwelling places & (al-ḥādir min qawmīnā) used to tell their shepherds, “Woe to you! Send your flocks to pasture where Ibnat Abi Dhu’ayb’s shepherd sends his flock!” But their flocks nevertheless would come back in the evening hungry, not yielding a drop of milk, while my flock would come back satiated and full of milk. We kept on recognizing increased bounty from God through the child, until two years had gone by, when I weaned him. He was growing up into a boy such as none of the other lads were, so that by the time he was two years old, he was a well-formed child beyond the age of suckling. We brought him to his [real] mother, although we were very eager for him to continue staying with us because of the blessing we observed he had brought us. So we talked with his mother and said to her, “O wet nurse (zi‘r), I should like you to leave my little boy with me [for a further period], until he becomes big and sturdy, for I fear his succumbing to the plague in Mecca.” She related: We kept on at her until she sent him back with us.

She related: We brought him back, and by God, a few months after our return with him, he and his [foster] brother were with some lambs of ours, behind our tents, when his [foster] brother came running toward us and told me and his [foster] father, “Two men wearing white robes have come to that Qurashi brother of mine, and have laid him down on the ground and slit open his belly and are at this moment stirring it up.” She related: His [foster] father and I rushed to his side and said to him, “What’s the matter, my dear son?” He replied, “Two men wearing white robes came up to me, laid me down on the\n
\[651. As Guillaume observed, Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, trans. 71 n. 1, the implication that Aminah was not Muhammad’s biological mother is rather strange.\]

\[652. These miraculous events attending Ḥalimah’s suckling of the infant Muhammad, the abundance of milk from the animals in time of dearth, and the revival of the flagging donkey, are part of the traditional Sirah of the Prophet. See Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 103–105 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 171–73, tr. 70–71; Ibn Sa’d, Kitāb al-Tabaqāt al-kabīr, I/1, 69–70, and cf. Lings, Muhammad, 33–36. See for modern discussions of these miraculous details, Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds. 28ff.; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 117–17; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 33–36; Annemarie Schimmel, And Muhammad Is His Messenger. The Veneration of the Prophet in Islamic Piety, 10.\]
The Birth of the Messenger of God

ground, slit open my belly, and searched within it for something I know not what." She said: We took him back with us to our tent. She related: His (foster) father said to me: "O Ḥalīmah, by God, I fear that this child may have been struck by some malady, so take him back to his family before the results of the attack become manifest." She related: So we picked him up and bore him back to his mother. She asked, "What has made you bring him back, O wet nurse, when you were formerly so anxious for his welfare and for his remaining with you?" She related: I said, "God has allowed my (foster) son to grow up so far, and I have fulfilled the duties incumbent upon me. I now fear that something untoward may afflict him, so I have handed him back to you as you desire." Āminah asked me, "What's all this that has happened to you? Tell me the truth!" She related: She would not leave me alone until I had told her the whole story. She asked, "Were you then afraid a demon (al-shayṭān) had possessed him?" She related: I replied, "Yes." She exclaimed, "By God, indeed no! No demon has power over him. My dear son has a great future before him; shall I not tell you his story?" She related: I answered, "Yes, please." Āminah said, "When I became pregnant with him, a light went forth from me which illuminated all the fortresses of Buṣrā in the land of Syria for me, and thereafter I bore him, and by God, I never had a pregnancy that was easier and smoother than the one with him. Then when I gave birth to him, he slid out, and placed his hands on the ground and raised his head toward the heavens. Leave him now, and go back with your task honorably fulfilled."

There related to us Naṣr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī—Muḥammad b. Ya'lā—‘Umar b. Ṣubayḥ—Thawr b. Yazīd al-Sha’mī—Makḥūl al-Sha’mī—Shaddād b. Aws, who said: Once, while we were sitting with the Messenger of God, there approached a shaykh of the Banū ‘Āmir, who was the leading chief and sayyid of his tribe and descendant of a great shaykh, leaning upon a staff, and appeared before the Messenger of God, standing here, and attributed the latter genealogically to his grandfather, saying thus, "O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, I have been informed that you claim to be the Messenger of God to the people (al-nās) and that [you claim that] God has sent you with the message which He entrusted to Ibrāhīm (Abraham), Mūsā (Moses), 'Īsā (Jesus), and other prophets. [I am further informed] that you have pronounced a momentous message (fawwahta bi-'azīmūn). But the prophets and the representatives of God (al-khulafā') have stemmed only from two houses of the Children of Israel, whereas you come from a people who worship these stones and idols. So what connection have you with prophethood? Nevertheless, every utterance has its core of truth, so tell me about the truth of your words and the beginnings of your claim to prophethood." He related: The Prophet was pleasurably impressed by his question, and replied, "O brother of the Banū 'Āmir, this affair you are asking me about has indeed its own story and place (or: occasion) where (or: when) it should be recounted, so sit down!"

The man bent his legs and then knelt down just as a camel does, and the Prophet faced him and began to speak. He said: "O brother of the Banū 'Āmir, the truth of my words and the beginnings of my claim to prophethood lie in the fact that I am what my forefather Abraham prayed for and the good news of my brother Jesus, son of Mary. I was my mother's first born, and she conceived and bore me as the heaviest burden she had ever borne and began to complain of the weight she felt to her fellow wives (or: fellow womenfolk, sawāhibihā). Then my mother saw in a dream that what she bore in her womb was a light, and she said, "I began to follow the light with my gaze, and the light went before my gaze until it lit up for me the whole eastern and western limits of the earth." Then she gave birth to me, and I grew up. When I grew up, the idols of Quraysh were rendered hateful to me, as was also poetry. I was offered for suckling among the Banū Layth b. Bakr.

---

653. This seems to be the sense here of fawwaha, although the lexica only give the meaning for this form II verb of "[God] created someone with a wide mouth."

654. In the years at Mecca before his call to prophethood, Muḥammad is said to have recoiled from swearing by Allāt and al-'Uzza, but this premature rejection of polytheism may be a retrojection of subsequent attitudes. Also, Muḥammad's rejection of poetry was not presumably from lack of interest or for aesthetic reasons but, as is clear from Qur'ān, XXVI, 221–26, cf. LXIX, 40–43, because the themes of poetry were the expression par excellence of the old pagan order, with its violence, its emphasis on revenge, and its proclamation of trust in human effort as a major factor in life, attitudes which the new faith of Islam aimed at countering or transforming.

655. In al-Ṭabarī, I, 969, p. 271 above, Ḥalīmah's tribe is the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr. Layth b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt were one of the main branches of Kinānah; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 36, II, 6, 376.
The Birth of the Messenger of God

One day, I was away from the rest of my people in the bottom of a wadi, with a group of children of my own age, and we were playing at throwing between us pieces of camels' dung. Suddenly, a group of three men approached us, bearing a gold pitcher filled with snow. They took me out of the group of my friends, and the latter fled until they reached the edge of the wadi. Then they came back to the group of three and said, "What do you intend to do with this lad? He is not one of us but is the son of the lord of Quraysh, and is an orphan, for whom a wet nurse was sought among us; he has no father. What good will killing him bring you, and what will you gain from that? But if you are determined ineluctably on killing him, then choose one of us, whichever you like; let him come to you in his stead, and then kill him; but leave this lad alone, he is an orphan." However, when the children saw the group of three men returning no answer to them, they fled at top speed back to the tribe, telling them what had happened and imploring help against the men.

One of the three men came up to me and laid me gently on the ground, and then split open my body from the division of my rib cage (mafraq şadri) to the end of the pubic hair, while I was watching all this but not feeling any touch at all. He then took out the viscera from my abdomen and washed them with that snow. He washed them carefully and replaced them. Then the second man stood up and said to his companion, "Stand aside," and he drew him away from me. He then put his hand into my insides and brought forth my heart, with me watching all the time. He split it asunder, extracted a black drop and threw the drop aside. He went on to say: In his hand, at his right side, there was as if he were holding something, and lo and behold, just by me was a seal ring in his hand, emitting light that dazzled anyone looking at it, and by means of which he sealed my heart so that it became filled with light; this was the light of prophethood and wisdom. Then he returned it to its place. I felt the coolness of that seal ring in my heart for a long time afterward. The third man now said to his companion, "Stand aside from me," and he passed his hand over my body from the division of my rib cage to the end of the pubic hair, and that slit was henceforth healed together, by God's permission. He now took my hand and gently made me get up from my resting place, and said to the first man, who had slit open my body, "Weigh him against ten of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. Next he said, "Weigh him against a hundred of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. Finally he said, "Weigh him against a thousand of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. He then said, "Let him be; even if you were to weigh him against the whole of his community, he would outweigh them all!" He related: They then clasped me to their breasts, and kissed my head and the place between my eyes. They said to me, "O my dear one, you have not been rendered terrified. If only you knew the goodness and benefit that is intended through you, you would rejoice and be refreshed."

He related: While we were engaged thus, behold, I found the tribe at my side, who had come in their entirety, and there was my mother, who was [really] my wet nurse, in the forefront of the tribe, crying out at the top of her voice and saying, "Alas for a poor, weak one!" He related: They crowded round me and fell upon me, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you O poor, weak one!" Then my wet nurse lamented, "Alas for a solitary one!" at which they crowded round and fell upon me and clasped me to their breasts, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you, O solitary one, for you are not a solitary one—indeed God, His angels, and all the believers of the people of the earth are with you!" But my wet nurse still lamented, "Alas for an orphan, treated as a weak one among your companions and then killed because of your weakness!" at which they crowded round and fell upon me and clasped me to their breasts, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you, O orphan, how noble you are in the sight of God! If you only knew what goodness and blessing is intended through you!" He related: They [i.e., the three miraculous visitors] brought me to the edge of the wadi. When my mother, who was [really] my wet nurse, saw me, she cried out, "O my dear son! Do I really see you still alive?" and she came up to me, fell upon me and clasped me to her breast. And by Him in whose hand is my soul, I was within her bosom, she having clasped me to her, while my hand was still in the hand of one of the three men. I began to turn toward them, imagining that the members of the tribe could see them [also], but they could not in fact see them. One of the members of the tribe commented, "Some touch of madness or a visitation of the jinn has affected this lad; let us take him along to our soothsayer and medicine man (kāhin), so that he may examine him and cure him." I said to him, "O so-and-so, nothing such as you mention has affected me; my mental faculties are intact and my heart is sound; I am not afflicted by any malady." My father said—he being the husband of my wet nurse—"Do you not perceive that what he says is the speech of a perfectly sound person? I fully expect that no affliction will permanently affect my son." They nevertheless agreed upon taking me along to the soothsayer, and they carried me until they came to him. When they related to him the story of what had happened to me, he told them, "Shut up, until I hear from the child himself, for he knows more about what happened to him than you do." He questioned me, and I told him my story, from beginning to end. When he had heard my words, he sprang up and clasped me to his breast, and then called out in the loudest possible voice, "O Arabs, O Arabs, forward! Kill this lad, and kill me with him, for by Allāt and al-ʿUzza, if you let him be and he reaches the age of puberty, he will most certainly subvert your religion, declare your minds and those of your forefathers to be deluded, oppose your way of life, and bring forward for you a religion of whose like you have never heard." I made for my foster mother, and she snatched me away from his bosom, saying, "You yourself are certainly more deranged and more possessed by the jinn than this son of mine, and if I had only known that you would have made such a pronouncement as this, I would not have brought him along to you. Seek out for yourself someone who will kill you, for I am not going to kill this lad!" Then they bore me along and handed me back to my family. I subsequently lost all fear of what had been done to me, and the traces of that cut from my breast to the end of the pubic hair became just a faint line. This, 0 brother of the Banū ʿĀmir, is the truth of my words and the beginnings of my claim to prophethood.

---

656. qalabah, literally "a condition or malady for which the afflicted one should be turned over and examined," apparently a disease of camels and horses; according to the lexicographers, it was only used in negative contexts, as here. See Lane, Lexicon, 2554b–c.

657. The story of the opening of Muḥammad's breast has been first given by al-
The ‘Āmirī exclaimed, “I call to witness God, than whom there is no other god, that your calling is a true one, so give me information about various things I am going to ask you.” The Prophet replied, “Ask what you want (sal ‘anka)” [before this, the Prophet always used to say to a questioner, “Ask whatever you wish and about what seems good to you,” sal ‘amā shi‘ta wa-ammā badā laka; he only said to the ‘Āmirī on that particular day sal ‘anka because that was a dialectical peculiarity [lughah] of the Banū ‘Āmir]. The Prophet spoke to him concerning what he knew.

The ‘Āmirī said, “Tell me, O Ibn ‘Abd al-Muttalib, about that which increases one’s knowledge.”

Tabari at I, 972–73, pp. 274–75 above, on the basis of four isnāds all going through Ibn Isḥaq and in a fairly brief form. It is now given in greater detail in a khabar going back to Shaddād b. ‘Amr b. Thābit [nephew of the poet of Medina Ḥassān b. Thābit, died 58/678; see Ibn Sa‘d, Kitāb al-tabaqāt al-kabīr, VII/2, 124]. Then thirdly, we have at I, 979, p. 282 below, a briefer version in a khabar going back to Khalīd b. Ma‘dān al-Kalā‘ī (known as an ascetic and as a trustworthy authority, thiqah, for hadith transmission, died 103/721–22; see Ibn Sa‘d, op. cit., VII/2, 162). Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstefeld, 105–06 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 173–76, tr. 71–72, gives, of course, the first version, that through Ibn Isḥaq, as does Ibn Sa‘d, op. cit., I/1, 70.

Again, this story can be paralleled in the lore and legend of many other human societies. The visitation by angels or spirits, the slitting open of Muḥammad’s belly, the removal of the black spot of sin and purification by washing with snow, all suggest ritual cleansing and the communication of extraordinary powers. In the Jāhiliyyah, it was often held that the jinn could communicate poetic inspiration to a man by similar means. Goldziher, in his Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, I, 213, cited as a parallel to the history of the opening of Muḥammad’s breast what the sister of the poet of al-Ta‘if, Umayyah b. Abī al-$alt (on whom see n. 603 above) is said to have told the Prophet that a jinnī in the form of a vulture opened the breast of the sleeping Umayyah, filled his breast with something unspecified and then closed it up. This gave the prophet Umayyah the inspiration for introducing wise aphorisms (hikmah) into his poems and also the idea of divine unity [tawḥīd].

What connection the story of Muḥammad and his supernatural visitants has with the words of Qur’ān, XCIV, 1–2, “Did We not open your breast, And removed from you your burden?” is unclear. The Qur’ān commentators take this figuratively rather than literally [i.e., with the verb sharaha in a-lam nashrah ṣadraka taken as meaning “to remove, lift away” rather than “to cut open”]: see Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, 515–16; Bell, A Commentary on the Qur’ān, II, 554], that God opened up thereby Muḥammad’s awareness of the spiritual world; but there is always the possibility that the story of the opening of Muḥammad’s breast may have evolved to explain the Qur’ānic passage in a literal sense. See Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds, 32–34; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 35–36; H. Birkeland, The Legend of the Opening of Muhammad’s Breast, passim; Schimmel, And Muhammad Is His Messenger, 67–69.
plied, "The process of learning." The 'Āmirī asked, "Tell me what points toward knowledge." The Prophet replied, "Asking questions." The 'Āmirī asked, "Tell me about that which increases in evil." The Prophet replied, "Persistence [in evil ways]." The 'Āmirī asked, "Tell me, is piety of any avail after evil doing?" The Prophet replied, "Yes, repentance (tawbah) cleanses from sin, and good deeds sweep away evil deeds. If a servant [of God] mentions his Lord's name when he is enjoying ease of life, God will aid him in times of distress." The 'Āmirī said, "How can that be, O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib?" The Prophet replied, "This is because God says, 'No, by my power and exaltedness, I shall not gather together for My servant two causes of security, nor shall I ever gather together for him two causes of fear. If he shows fear toward Me in this present world, he will feel secure from Me (i.e., from my wrath) on the Day when I shall gather together all my servants in the sacred enclosure (ḥaẓ̄arat al-quds)." This feeling of security will remain with him perpetually and I shall not withhold my blessings from him when I do deny blessings [from others]. But if he feels secure from Me (i.e., self-sufficient) in this present world, he will fear Me on the day when I shall gather together all my servants at a specified time on an appointed day, and his fear will remain with him perpetually.'"

The 'Āmirī said, "Tell me, O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, to what are you summoning people?" The Prophet replied, "I am summoning people to worship the One God, who has no partners, and that you should throw off allegiance to idols, proclaim your disbelief in Allāt and al-'Uzza, affirm your belief in the Book or the prophets which have come from God, perform the five acts of worship with all their significant details, fast for a month in each year, and hand over poor tax on your wealth, [for if you do so,] God will purify you by means of it and render your wealth wholesome for you. Also, that you should perform the Pilgrimage to the [Holy] House when you are able to do this, perform the major ablution (ghusl) after

658. The Cairo text of al-Ṭabarî, II, 164, has haẓ̄arat al-firdaws "enclosure of Paradise," as in ms. P. of the Leiden text, see n. 6. The reference is to the gathering together of the saved after the Last Judgment, as foretold in Qur'ān, XIX, 85/88, and their admittance to Paradise. See EP, s.v. Kiyāma [L. Gardet].
major bodily pollution (janābah), and believe in death and the resurrection after death, and in the Garden and Hell Fire.” The 'Āmiri said, “O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, if I do all that, what will be my reward?” The Prophet replied, “The Garden of Eden, from below which springs of water flow, in which [those who are saved] will remain forever, that is the reward of those who aim at righteousness.” The 'Āmiri said, “O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, is there, as well as all that, any advantage for this present life, for I find ease and pleasantness of daily life attractive?” The Prophet replied, “Yes, indeed, success and a firm place in the land.” He related: The 'Āmiri responded to the Prophet’s call and turned to God. There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Ishāq—Thawr b. Yazid—Khalid b. Ma'dān al-Kalā'ī, who said: A group of the Messenger of God’s followers asked, “O Messenger of God, tell us about yourself!” He replied, “Yes, I will. I am what my forefather Abraham prayed for and the good news of Jesus. My mother saw in a dream when she bore me within her womb that there came forth from her a light which illuminated for her the fortresses of Buṣrā in the land of Syria. I was offered for suckling to the women of the Banū Sa’d b. Bakr. Once when I was with one of my (foster) brothers, behind our tents, tending our lambs, there came to me two men wearing white robe and bearing a golden pitcher filled with snow. They took hold of me, split open my belly and then extracted from it my heart, which they split open, taking out from it a black blood clot. They threw it aside, and then washed my belly and my heart with that snow, until they had cleansed it. Then one of them said to his companion, ‘Weigh him with ten of his community,’ so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Then he said, ‘Weigh him with a hundred of his community,’ so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Then he said, ‘Weigh him with a

659. That is, the major ablution required after such polluting events as sexual intercourse, contact with menstrual blood, etc. See EP, s.v. Ghusl [G. H. Bousquet].
660. Qur’an, XX, 78/76. For this interpretation of tazakkā in a late Meccan-early Medinan context, see Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 165–66.
661. Again echoing Qur’anic phraseology, in which al-tamakkun fi al-ard, “establishing a firm place in the land,” is often a reward for the righteous.
The Birth of the Messenger of God

thousand of his community,' so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Finally, he said, 'Leave him alone, for even if I were to weigh him with [the whole of] his community, he would be equal to them.'"

Ibn Ishāq says: 'Abd Allāh b. ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God's father, died at a time when the Messenger of God's mother, Āminah bt. Wahb b. ‘Abd Manāf b. Zuhrāh, was pregnant with him.

As for Hishām [b. Muḥammad], he says: 'Abdallāh, the Messenger of God’s father, died when the Messenger of God was twenty-eight months old.662

There related to me al-Hārith—Ibn Sa’d, who said: Muḥammad b. ‘Umar al-Wāqīḍī stated that the firmly accepted belief, from which none of our companions differ, is that ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib came back from Syria in a caravan of Quraysh’s and encamped at Medina, and he remained there until he died. He was buried in the building (dār) of al-Nabīghah, in the small hut (al-dār al-ṣuḥrā), [which is], when you go into the building, on your left, within the house (bayt).663

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq—‘Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ‘Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī, who said that the Messenger of God’s mother Āminah died at al-Abwā’ between Mecca and Medina when the Messenger of God

662. Ibn Ishāq preferred the view that ‘Abdallāh died before Āminah gave birth to Muḥammad, although one line of transmission adds that he died when Muḥammad was twenty-eight months old. Other authorities mentioned, such as Ibn al-Kalbī cited here, give figures like twenty-eight months or seven months for Muḥammad's age at his father’s death. Half-a-century later than Ibn Ishāq, however, the historian al-Wāqīḍī [on whom see n. 1020 below] had much more circumstantial detail about the time and place of 'Abdallāh's death [cf. below and n. 663]. See Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 102 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 167, tr. 69; Ibn Sa’d, Tabaqāt, I/1, 61–62; and the detailed discussion of the varying reports on 'Abdallāh's death in Lecker, "The Death of the Prophet Muḥammad's Father: Did Wāqīḍī Invent Some of the Evidence?" 9–27.

663. Ibn Sa’d, Tabaqāt, I/1, 61, following reports used by al-Wāqīḍī, says that ‘Abdallāh was taken ill on the way back from Syria, was unable to carry on the journey to Mecca and died at Medina among his maternal kinsmen, the Banū ‘Adī b. al-Najjār [his grandfather Ḥāshim having married Salmā bt. ‘Amr from this Medinan clan, see Ibn Hishām, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wüstenfeld, 88 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 144–45, tr. 59; Ibn Sa’d, op. cit., I/1, 46].
was six years old, she had brought him to Medina to let him visit his maternal uncles of the Banū ‘Adi b. al-Najjār, but she died on the way back to Medina with him. 664

Al-Hāriṣī related to me—Muḥammad b. Sa‘d—Muḥammad b. ‘Umar—Ibn Jurayj—‘Uthmān b. Ṣafwān, who said that Ḍayy b. Wahb’s grave is in the ravine of Abū Dharr at Mecca.

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Ishāq—al-‘Abbās b. ‘Abbās b. Ma‘bad b. al-‘Abbās—some member of his family, who said that ‘Abb al-Muṭṭalib died when the Messenger of God was eight years old. But another authority says that ‘Abb al-Muṭṭalib died when the Messenger of God was ten years old.

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ṭalḥah b. ‘Amr al-Ḥadramī—‘Āṭā’ b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn ‘Abbās, who said: The Prophet was in the care of Abū Ṭālib after his grandfather ‘Abb al-Muṭṭalib, and became the latter’s child as if he were part of himself. 665

The story returns to the completion of the reign of Kiswa Anūshfarwān.

664. Ibn Hishām, Siḥat al-nabi, ed. Wustenfeld, 107 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 177, tr. 73, and Ibn Sa‘d, Tabaqāt, I/1, 73–74, confirm that Ḍayy died at al-Abwā when Muḥammad was six years old, and state that the Prophet visited and tended her grave and mourned over her when he was en route for al-Hudaybiyah in 6/628. Al-Abwā lay just north of Mecca along the Medina road; it was said to be the goal of Muhammad’s first ghazwah or raid against the Banū Damrah and the Banū Bakr b. ‘Abb Manāt of Kinānah only twelve months after the Hijrah. See al-Bakrī, Muḥjam maṣāḥfat, I, 102; Yaqūt, Buldān, I, 79–80; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 84, 340; Al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz, 35–40.

665. ḍhumsan ṭumsan ... saqīsan dāhīn—literally, “like the wet and dry dirty matter which collects in the inner corner of the eye . . . and like something smooth and anointed with oil.”
There related to us ‘Ali b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣili—Abū Ayyūb Ya‘lā b. Ḥimān b. Hānī’ al-Makhzumī—his father, who was a hundred and fifty years old. He said: When it was the night in which the Messenger of God was born, the Ayvān of Kisrā was shaken and fourteen pinnacles of it fell down; the [sacred] fire of Fārs, which had not previously been extinguished for a thousand years, was extinguished; the waters of the lake of Sawāh sank into the earth; and the Chief Mūbadh saw in a dream refractory camels running before noble Arab horses which had crossed the Tigris and had spread through those districts of it. The next morning, Kisrā was affrighted by what he had seen. He resolutely held himself back in patience, but then he considered that he ought not to conceal it from his ministers and Marzbāns. He put on his crown and seated himself on his throne.

666. That is, the Ayvān or Ṭaq-i Kisrā, the great Sāsānid palace in the district of Aspānbār at al-Madā’in, on the east bank of the Tigris, where its ruinous partial shell still exists. See Le Strange, Lands, 34; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 126–28; EI², s.v. al-Madā’in [M. Streck-M. J. Morony].

667. Presumably the great fire temple at Iṣṭākhr, i.e., at Persepolis, at whose ruins al-Mas‘ūdī marvelled. See his Murūj, III, 76–77 = § 1403; EI², s.v. Ātaškada [M. Boyce].

668. Sawāh is a town of northwestern Persia, in the mediaeval Islamic province of Jībāl, not however known to have existed in pre-Islamic times. It was nevertheless made the site of one of these tales of portents announcing the Prophet’s birth. See Yaḡūt, Buldān, III, 179–80; Le Strange, Lands, 211–12; Schwarz, Iran, 339–42; EI², s.v. Sawā [C. E. Bosworth-H. H. Schaeder].

669. These portents are mentioned also by al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, I, 217, II, 228 = §§ 231, 649.
and gathered them around him. When they were all gathered together around him, he told them why he had sent for them and what he had summoned them for. While they were engaged in all this, a letter arrived bringing news of the extinguishing of the [sacred] fire, so that his distress of spirit increased. The Chief Mōbadh said, "I too—may God grant the king righteousness—had a dream that same night," and he recounted to him his dream about the camels. The king said, "What is this thing, O Chief Mōbadh," although he himself was the most knowing about the real meaning of that. The Chief Mōbadh replied, "An event which is issuing from the Arabs."

On hearing that, Kisra wrote a letter, as follows: "From Kisra, the king of kings, to al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir. As follows: Send to me a man who is knowledgeable about what I wish to ask him," so al-Nu'mān dispatched to him 'Abd al-Masiḥ b. 'Amr b. Ḥāyān b. Buqaylah al-Ghassānī.670 When the letter reached Kisra, Kisra asked him, "Do you know what I wish to ask you?"

He replied, "Let the king tell me about it; and if I am knowledgeable about it, [well and good], but if not, I can tell him about someone who will know it for him." Kisra accordingly told him about his dream. 'Abd al-Masiḥ said, "A maternal uncle of mine who lives in the elevated regions of Syria, called Sāṭīḥ, will have knowledge about it."671 Kisra said, "Go to him, and ask him what I have just asked you, and bring me back his answer." 'Abd al-Masiḥ rode off on his mount until he came to Sāṭīḥ, who was, however, on the verge of death. He greeted him and wished him long life, but Sāṭīḥ returned no answer. Hence 'Abd al-Masiḥ began to recite:672

670. This member of the Christian 'Ībād of al-Ḥiraḥ seems to have been a historical person, although his role in these events and the attribution to him of an age of 350 years are clearly embellishments. He is said to have negotiated with Khalid b. al-Walid for the surrender of al-Ḥiraḥ to the incoming Muslim Arabs. See al-Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 243; al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, I, 217–22 = §§ 231–33; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aḥkām, XVI, 194–95.

Buqaylah was one of the clans of al-Ḥiraḥ, of Ghassānīd tribal origin, as appears also from al-Ṭabari, I, 1023, p. 349 below, which had a castle (qaṣr) of its own. See al-Ya‘qūbī, Kitāb al-buldān, 309, tr. G. Wiet, 140–41; Nöldeke, trans. 254 n. 2; Rothstein, Lahmiden, 114 n. 2.

671. For Sāṭīḥ, see al-Ṭabari, I, 911ff., pp. 178ff. above.

672. Nöldeke noted, trans. 255 n. 1, that the manuscripts have considerable variation in the readings of various words and in the order of these rajaz verses,
[The Remainder of Kīṣrā Anūsharwān's Reign] 287

Is the proud lord of Yemen deaf, or does he hear? Or has he gone away, and has the course of untimely death made away with him?

O you who are able to give the interpretation of an affair which was too difficult for this man and that, the shaykh of the tribe, from the house of Sanan, has come to you, Whose mother is from the house of Dhi 'b b. Ḥajān, a blue-eyed one, with sharpened fang, whose ears are ringing, A shining white one, with an ample cloak and corselet of mail, the envoy of the prince (qayl) of the Persians, who journeys onward during the time for sleeping.

A stout, compactly built she-camel travels through the land, which conveys me up a rocky slope at one time and down it the next,

Fearing neither thunderbolts nor the misfortunes of time, until it becomes lean and emaciated in the breast and the part between the thighs (i.e., from traveling continuously).

The fine dust of the deserted encampments' traces swirls round it in the wind, as if it were galloping vigorously from the two slopes of Thakan.

When Saṭīḥ heard the verses, he raised his head and said: 'Abd al-Masīḥ—traveling on a camel—to Saṭīḥ—who is already on the brink of the tomb—the king of the sons of Sāsān has sent you—because of the Aywān's being shaken—and the extinguishing of the fires—and the dream of the Chief Mōbād—of refractory camels running before noble Arab horses—which had crossed the Tigris and spread through those districts of it—O 'Abd al-Masīḥ, with interchanging of hemistichs, and that the text and interpretation of the poem is uncertain in parts. Older poets, as here 'Abd al-Masīḥ, use the masḥtūr form of the rajaz meter in which, in each bayt, every shatr rhymes with the following hemistich and not just with regard to the two hemistichs of the first bayt; with a common rhyme for the whole poem, hemistich by hemistich, interchange of hemistichs within bayts is easy. See Wright, A Grammar of the Arabic Language, II, 362A–B.

673. Sanan and Dhi 'b b. Ḥajān must be tribal groups of Yemen, but do not figure in such works as Ibn al-Kalbī's Jamhārat al-nasab or al-Hamdānī's Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab.

674. Thakan is listed by al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 342, and Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 82, but with no mention of its location and with this verse as the only shāhīd for it.
when there has been much recounting of stories—and the man with the staff has been sent—and the valley of al-Samawah has overflowed (i.e., with invading troops)—and the waters of the lake of Sawah have sunk into the earth—and the sacred fire of Fars has been extinguished—then Syria is no longer for Sat'īh Syria—kings and queens from amongst them (i.e., the last Sāsānids) shall reign—according to the number of pinnacles (i.e., those fallen from the Aywān)—and everything whose coming is decreed will come." Then Sat'īh expired on the spot. 'Abd al-Masīh now mounted his steed and recited:

Gird yourself for action, for you are keen in resolution, vigorous! Let not separation and mutability affright you!

If the dominion of the sons of Sāsān escapes from their hands, well, time is made up of different evolutions and lengthy periods.

How oft, O how oft did they reach a lofty stage in which lions which tear their prey were afraid of their mighty onrush!

To them belongs Mihrān, the man of the lofty tower, and his brothers, the two Hurmuzs, Sābūr and [the other] Sābūr.

The people are all half brothers and sisters of each other; when one of them comes to realize that another one has become lacking in some way, that person is cast aside and treated with contempt.

But they are also brothers from the same mother; when they see some item of property, that item is protected and supported in the owner's absence.

Good and bad fortune are closely linked together like a rope binding two camels; good fortune is sought after, but bad fortune is avoided.

When 'Abd al-Masīh arrived back to Kīsrā, he informed him of Satīh's words. Kīsrā commented, "Once fourteen of us have re-

---

675. That is, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the second caliph, mentioned here as bearing his staff of office (hirāwah, the equivalent of the qadīb or 'aṣūd), with which the stern 'Umar trounced malefactors and which became one of the insignia of the caliphal office. See EP, s.v. Kadīb [D. Sourdèl].

676. That is, "the elevated land," the desert region between the Euphrates and Syria. See EP, s.v. al-Samāwā [C. E. Bosworth].

677. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 885, p. 131 and n. 340 above.
igned, things will happen!" Ten of them, however, reigned for a total of four years only, and the rest of them held power until the reign of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.678

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad,679 who said: [On one occasion,] Wahrīz dispatched wealth and valuable specialities of Yemen to Kīsrā. When these reached the territory of the Banū Tamīm, Ṣa‘ṣa‘ah b. Naqiyah b. 'Iqāl al-Mujashi'ī680 summoned the Banū Tamīm to fall upon the caravan, but they refused. When the caravan reached the territory of the Banū Yarbū', 681 Ṣa‘ṣa‘ah summoned these last to do that, but they were fearful of doing it. He said, O Banū Yarbū', I can foresee that this caravan will pass into the territory of the Banū Bakr b. Wā‘il and they will attack it, and they will then use the wealth acquired hereby to make war on you!682 When they heard that, they plundered the caravan. A man of the Banū Salīṭ called al-Naṭīf seized a saddle bag filled with jewels, hence people said, "He has seized the treasure of al-Naṭīf," and this became proverbial. Ṣa‘ṣa‘ah acquired a palm-leaf basket containing silver ingots. The people of the caravan went to Hawdhah b. 'Alī al-Ḥanāfī in al-Yamāmah,683 who pro-

678. The ten ephemeral rulers mentioned here would presumably be those transient rulers, pretenders, and usurpers who filled the four years or so after Heraclius's invasion of Mesopotamia in 627 had left a legacy of chaos and confusion within the Persian ruling classes; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1045–66, pp. 381–409 below. Of the kings after Anūsharwān, only three persons, Hormizd IV, Khusrwā II Abarwēz, and Yazdagird III, could be said to have enjoyed reigns of reasonable duration.

679. Nöldeke, trans. 257 n. 3, noted that the Arabic sources on the conflict of the Persians with the Arabs of Tamīm give considerably varying stories but fall substantially into two versions, the one largely agreeing with the account here, the other, however, quite aberrant; and he stressed the vivacity and generally realistic nature of the Arabic narratives on this topic.

680. Grandfather of the famous Umayyad poet al-Farazdaq, and called mūḥī al-mawwūdāt "he who restores to life those female children meant for killing," because he ransomed—allegedly as many as three or four hundred—girls about to be slaughtered by their destitute parents. See Abū al-Faraj al-Īṣfahānī, Aḡhāni3, XXI, 276–77.

681. An important group of the Tamīm b. Murr, as were the Mujashi’. The Salīṭ mentioned below were a subgroup of them. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamḥarat al-nasab, I, Tables 68–71, II, 9, 591; EP, s.v. Yarbū’, Banū (G. Levi Della Vida).

682. The Bakr and the Tamīm were ancient enemies, as was to be seen at the "Day of Dhu Qār," see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1015ff., pp. 338ff. below.

683. Hawdhah was one of the leading men of the Ḥanafī b. Lujaym, a component tribe of the Bakr and occupiers of the rich eastern Arabian province of alvided them with clothing, food supplies, and mounts, and personally accompanied them until he reached Kisra's presence.
Hawdhah was a handsome and eloquent man, and Kisra was favorably impressed by him and accounted to his credit what he had done. He called for a circlet of pearls, and it was placed on Hawdhah's head [as a diadem], and he gave him a brocade coat of honor and many other items of clothing; because of all that, Hawdhah was called "the man with the crown." Kisra said to Hawdhah, "Do you know whether these fellows, who have done this deed, are from your own tribe?" He answered, "No." Kisra said, "Is there a peace agreement between you and them?" He replied, "[No,] there is death between us." Kisra said, "Your requirement is now about to be fulfilled," and he resolved to send a force of cavalry against the Banû Tamîm.

He was informed, however, "Their land is a bad land, made up of deserts and wastes, with tracks that cannot be followed. Their water comes from wells, and one cannot be sure that they will not block them up, with the result that your troops will perish." He was advised to write to his governor in al-Bâhrâyân, Azâdî Firûz, son of Jushnas, whom the Arabs called al-Muka'bir ("the Mutila-tor"), because he used to cut off hands and feet.684 He had sworn not to leave, among the Banû Tamîm, a single eye that could flow with tears. Kisra followed this advice, and sent an envoy to him.
He also summoned Hawdhah again, and gave him a further, fresh lot of honors and presents, and told him, "Travel back with this envoy of mine, and secure a satisfactory solution (i.e., secure re-

---

684. After his operations against Tamîm, al-Muka'bir apparently remained in eastern Arabia, since he later led the Persian forces there together with their allies against Abû Bakr's commander al-'Alâ' b. al-Ḥadramî during the opening years of 'Umar's caliphate, but he eventually submitted and became a Muslim. See al-Balâdhûrî, Futûth, 85–86.

Yamâmah [see on the Ḥanîfah, Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab,
I, Table 156, II, 25, 297]. It was to Hawdhah [who was, as emerges from the poem cited by al-Ṭabarî, I, 987, p. 293 below, penultimate verse, a Christian, like much of the Banû Ḥanîfah at this time], together with Thumâmah b. Uthâl, that Muḥam-dad sent an envoy with a letter for "the king of al-Yamâmah" inviting him to become a Muslim, and Hawdhah was allegedly at one point in correspondence with Muḥammad offering to become a Muslim if he could have the succession to the Prophet's office after Muḥammad's death; but Hawdhah himself died shortly afterward and before the Prophet, probably in 8/630. See Ibn Hîshâm, Sirat al-nabi, ed. Wûstenfeld, 971–2 = ed. al-Saqqâ et al., IV, 254, tr. 653, 789; al-Balâdhûrî, Futûth, 86–87; EI², s.v. Musaylima (W. Montgomery Watt).
venge) for both myself and yourself." Hawdhah and the army reached al-Muka'bir just before the time for gleaning. Meanwhile, at that moment the Banū Tamīm had moved to Hajar in order to get provisions and gleanings. Al-Muka'bir's herald proclaimed, "Let those of the Banū Tamīm who are here, come forward, for the king has decreed that provisions and food should be made available for them and divided out among them." They came forward, and he brought them into al-Mushaqqar, which is a fortified place facing another fortress called al-Ṣafā and separated from it by a river called the Muhallim.685

The builder of al-Mushaqqar was one of Kīsrā's cavalry troops called Basak (?), son of Māḥbūḏ,686 whom Kīsrā had sent expressly for its construction. When he began work on it, he was told, "These workmen will not remain in this place unless they are provided with womenfolk; but if you do that, the construction work will be completed, and they will remain working on it until they have finished it." So he had brought for them whores from the regions of the Sawād and al-Ahwāz, and had skins of wine for them, from the land of Fārs, conveyed across the sea. The workmen and the women married each other and begat children, and soon comprised the greater part of the population of the town of Hajar. The people spoke Arabic and claimed kinship with the 'Abd al-Qays. When Islam came, they said to the 'Abd al-Qays, "You know well our numerical strength, our formidable equipment and

685. The port and fortress of al-Mushaqqar was the seat of Persian military power in the region of Hajar or the eastern Arabian shorelands, with the place's foundation variously attributed to the rulers of Kindah, the Persian commander mentioned below, etc. It lay in the territory of the 'Abd al-Qays tribe [on whom see al-Ṭabarī, I, 836, p. 51 and n. 150 above], but its exact site is unknown. See EP, s.v. al-Mushakkar (C. E. Bosworth). At all events, it became a notable center for the extension of Sāsānīd political control over the western shores of the Persian Gulf. By the mid-sixth century, the Arab poet of Bakr, Ṭarafah b. 'Abd, could call the Arabs of Bahrayn, with a distinct note of contempt, 'abid Asbadh [where Asbadh stems from asb, "horse," + ped, "chief, commander," pace Nöldeke's etymology, trans. 260 n. 1, from ispabadh] "slaves of the commander of mounted warriors," i.e., of the Persian mailed cavalrymen, while other poets refer to the Persians settled in eastern Arabia as Asbadhis. See Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 78–79.

686. On these two names [the second of which is, however, uncertain], see Nöldeke, trans. 260 n. 3, and Justi, Namenbuch, 185 (Mahbōdī), 357–58 ['Wasaka, Vasaces]. For the father Māḥbūḏ, Māḥbōdī, who played a great role as commander in fighting between the Persians and Byzantines during Hormizd's reign, see Nöldeke, trans. loc. cit. and 438 n. 4, and n. 703 below.
weapons, and our great proficiency, so enroll us formally among your tribe and give us your daughters in marriage." They responded, "No, but remain here as you were as our brothers and clients [mawāli]." One man of ‘Abd al-Qays said, "O tribesmen of ‘Abd al-Qays! Follow my suggestion and enroll them as full members of the tribe, for the likes of those people are very much to be desired." But another member of the tribe said, "Aren’t you ashamed of yourself? Are you telling us to take into our midst people who, as you know, have such beginnings and origins?" The first man replied, "If you don’t adopt them into the tribe, other Arabs will." The second man answered, "In that case, we shan’t worry about them in future!" Thereupon, they [i.e., those people from the mixed population of Hajar] became dispersed among the Arabs. Some remained with the ‘Abd al-Qays and were then reckoned as part of them, with no one gainsaying this attribution.

Once al-Muka’bir had got the Banū Tamīm within al-Mushaqqar, he massacred their menfolk and spared only the boys. On that day was killed Qa’nab al-Riyāḥī, the knight of the Banū Yarbū‘; two men of the Shann, who served the kings [of Persia] with alternate spells of duty, killed him.687 The boys were put in boats and conveyed across to Fārs; some of them were castrated as eunuchs. Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr al-‘Adawi related: After the conquest of Istakhr, there came to us a number of these deportees, one of them a eunuch and another a tailor.688 A man of the Banū Tamīm called Ubayy b. Wahb attacked the chain holding the gate [of the city], cut through it, and escaped. He then recited:

I remember Hind, although it is not the time for remembrance;
I remember her, even though several months’ journey separates me from her.

---

687. This encounter was the Yawm al-Ṣafqah, described at length in Abū al-Faraj Iṣfahānī, Aghānī3, XVII, 318–22, cf. Sir Charles Lyall, Translations from Ancient Arabian Poetry, Chiefly Pre-Islamic, 87–88. Qa’nab b. ‘Attāb al-Riyāḥī had been one of the plunderers of the Persian caravan from Yemen [Abū al-Faraj al-Īṣfahānī, op. cit., XVII, 318]. Shann were a clan of ‘Abd al-Qays; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 168, II, 28, 526.

688. Nöldeke, trans. 262 n. 1, pointed out that the Muslims did not conquer Istakhr till the 640s [actually in 23/643; see EI2, s.v. Istakhr [M. Streck-M. J. Morony]], hence the events mentioned here happened almost certainly later than the time of Khusraw I Anūsharwān, since he died early in 579.
[The Remainder of Kisrā Anūsharwān’s Reign] 293

[She is] from Hijāz, from the highlands, and her people dwell where the autumn rains pour down, between Zūr and Minwar.689

Ho there, has it come to my people, despite the distance separating us, that I defended my sacred interests (dhimārī) on that day of the gateway of al-Mushaqqar?

I struck with my sword the panel of the gateway such a blow, which would have made the most firmly built gateway spring open.

On that day, Hawdhah b. ‘Ali interceded with al-Muka’bir for a hundred of the captives from the Banū Tamīm; the latter granted them to Hawdhah on Easter Day, and Hawdhah freed them. Concerning this, al-A’shā recited:

Question Tamīm about him, how it was in the days when they were sold, when they came to him as captives, all of them reduced to submissiveness,

In the midst of al-Mushaqqar, among a host of dust-smeared, dark-colored ones (i.e., the victorious army), unable to secure any beneficial aid after the hurt (they had previously suffered).

He said to the king, “Free a hundred of them,” speaking gently, in a low voice, not raising it.

So he released a hundred from the band of captives, and all of them became freed of their bonds.

He put them forward openly, on Easter Day, as an offering, hoping (for a reward) from God for what he had done as a benefit and had wrought.

But they (i.e., the freed Tamīmis) did not consider as an act of benevolence all that which had just been vouchsafed (for them), even though their spokesman expressed a need for due acknowledgment (or: spoke the truth about it, qāla qā’iluhā ḥaqqa’n biḥā) and exerted himself in that.690

689. Nöldeke vocalized muṣāb and translated “on the hills of al-Khariṭ,” but the vocalization al-maṣāb, “place where rains pour down,” is followed here, with al-khariṭ in its usual sense of “autumn.” Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 216, mentions Manwar as a mountain, but clearly had no idea of its location.

He describes the Banū Tamīm here as ungrateful.

Hishām related: When Wahriz was close to death—this being toward the end of Anūsharwān’s reign—he called for his bow and an arrow, and said, “Set me up,” so they did this. He shot the arrow and said, “See where my arrow falls to earth, and make my grave there.” His arrow fell behind the monastery—that is, the church near Nu’m, a place called till today “the grave of Wahriz.” When the news of Wahriz’s death reached Kīsra, he sent out to Yemen a knight called W.y.n (?), who proved a pertinacious tyrant. Hence Hurmuz, the son of Kīsra, dismissed him and appointed as governor in his stead al-Marūzān. This last remained in Yemen, and had children born there who grew up to the age of puberty.

At this point Kīsra Anūsharwān died, after a reign of forty-eight years.

691. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 539, could only conjecture that this place was in the vicinity of Raḥbat Mālik b. Ṭawq, the latter place, in fact, in Syria [ibid., III, 34–36]. This dayr Nu’m must, however, have been in Yemen.

692. Marquart surmised that this was the al-Binajān of al-Ṭabarī, I, 958, pp. 251–52 above, but the editor Nöeldeke thought it more probable that there were two separate persons, W.y.n and W.y.naajān (= al-Binajān). See Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIII.

693. Thus corrected in Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit., following Marquart, from the text’s al-Marwazān, in the light of the form of the name in parallel Greek and Armenian sources; previously, Nöeldeke in his trans. 264 n. 1, had rendered the name as Marwazān.

Al-Ṭabarī, in company with other early historical writers like al-Yaʿqūbī and Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, does not mention Buzurgmīḥr/Buzurjmihr, famed sage and minister of Anūsharwān so famed in later Islamic lore and legend [al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 72, has a single, brief reference, but Ibn Qutaybah in his Uyūn al-
Then there assumed the royal power Hurmuz. He was the son of King Anūsharwān, and his mother was the daughter of Khāqān the Elder.695

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muhammad, who said: This Hurmuz, son of Kīsra, was well educated and full of good intentions of benevolence toward the weak and destitute, but he attacked the power of the nobles, so that they showed themselves hostile and hated him, exactly as he in turn hated them. When he assumed the crown, he gathered round himself the members of the nobility of his kingdom. They enthusiastically called down blessings on his head and offered up thanks for his father. Hurmuz gave them promises of benevolent rule; he was anxious to behave toward his subjects with justice but implacable against the great men of the kingdom, because of their oppressing the lowly folk.696 __ akhbār has frequent mentions and quotations from his hikmah. __ Extensive mention of him only appears in writers of the mid-fourth/tenth century onward, such as al-Mas'ūdī, al-Tha'alibī and especially Firdawsi, but thereafter he figures as the epitome of good counsel and wisdom in the "Mirrors for Princes" and similar adab works. This paragon may have arisen out of the Burzmihr who was a secretary of Anūsharwān's but who was, according to the Shāh-nāma, executed by that ruler's successor Hormizd IV. Christensen, "La légende du sage Buzurjmihr," 81–128, although now outdated, traced how the stories round him first appeared in Middle Persian literature and then grew in the Islamic period. De Blois, in his Burzōy's Voyage to India and the Origin of the Book of Kalīlah wa-Dīmhāh, 48–50, subjects Christensen's ideas to stringent analysis and concludes that Buzurgmihr remains a very shadowy individual, if he existed at all, nor does he think that there are any grounds for identifying him with Khusrw Anūsharwān's physician Burzōy, sent to India, according to the story, to fetch back a copy of the wonderful book Kalīlah wa-Dīmhāh. See also EI², s.v. Buzurgmihr (H. Massé); Elt, s.v. Bozorgmehr-e Boktagān (Djalal Khaleghi Motlagh).

695. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 899, p. 160 and n. 404. According to al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 74–75, Hormizd was the only son of Anisharwān's who was born of a noble mother, all the others being awlād sūqah.

696. Hormizd's policy of favoring the masses as a counterweight to the upper classes, who represented a threat to his despotic royal power, is stressed in the Arabic sources. Al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 75–77, puts into his mouth a lengthy accession speech enunciating guidelines for his future policy, including protection of the weaker, vulnerable members of society (al-du'afā' wa-ahl al-dī'ah) against the oppression of the upper classes (al-īlyah). This was a reversal of his father's cultivation of the support of the nobility and the Zoroastrian clergy, and the hostility of these latter entrenched interests was to contribute to Hor-
His justice reached such a point that he once went to Māh in order to spend the summer there. In the course of his journey thither, he gave orders for it to be proclaimed amongst his troops and all the others in his army camp that they were to avoid the cultivated fields and not to cause harm to any of the landholders (dahāqin) there. They were also to keep their mounts under control so that they caused no damage to the fields. He appointed a man who was to familiarize himself with the sort of thing that was going on in the army camp and to punish anyone who transgressed his command.

His own son Kisrā was in the army camp, and one of his riding beasts wandered off and strayed into one of the tilled fields along the way, started grazing, and created damage there. The animal was caught and brought to the man whom Hurmuz had appointed to punish anyone who caused damage to the tillage, or the owner of any beast that caused such damage, and to compel the offender to pay compensation. However, the man was not able to enforce Hurmuz's orders against Kisrā nor against any of those in Kisrā's retinue, hence he brought to Hurmuz's notice the damage he had observed that beast causing. Hurmuz ordered that he should crop that animal's ears and dock its tail, and that he should exact compensation from Kisrā. The man left Hurmuz's presence in order to put the king's orders into effect regarding Kisrā and his riding beast, but Kisrā secretly induced a group of the great men to ask him to go easy in putting the command into effect. They met him and talked to him about this, but he refused to listen. They asked him to delay putting into practice Hurmuz's order to him concerning the beast, until they had a chance to speak with the king and to persuade him to leave the animal alone. He agreed to this. That group of great men went to Hurmuz and told him that the steed that had done the damage was an ill-natured beast and mizd's downfall, blinding, and death, see al-Tabari, I, 993, p. 303 below. Nevertheless, Hormizd's justice is stressed, a justice greater than that of Anūsharwān, in the opinion of Tabari-Bal'ami, tr. II, 246-47. Also, Christian sources praise him for his tolerance, which included special favor for the Nestorian Catholicos at Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Ishō'yahb I [in office 582-95]. See Nöldeke, trans. 268 n. 3; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 200-203; Christensen, Sassanides, 441-43; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 162.

697. See for this place, al-Tabari, I, 865, p. 97 and n. 249 above.
that it had wandered off and entered the tilled field; they asked Hurmuz to withdraw his order that the beast's ears should be cropped and its tail docked because this would be a bad augury for Kisrā. Despite this, Hurmuz refused their request; on his orders, the steed's ears were cropped and its tail docked, and Kisrā was made to pay compensation in the same amount as other people were made to pay. Then Hurmuz moved off from his army camp.698

One day, at the time when the vines were ripening, Hurmuz rode out to Sābāṭ near al-Madā'in. His route went past orchards and vineyards. One of the men from Hurmuz's cavalry division who was riding with him noted a vineyard and saw in it partly ripened grapes. He picked some clusters and gave them to a squire (ghulām) who was accompanying him, telling him, "Take these back to our quarters, cook them with some meat, and make a broth out of it, for this is very wholesome and beneficial at this time." The guardian of that vineyard came up to him, gripped him fast and shouted loudly. The man's anxiety about being punished by Hurmuz for picking those grapes reached such a pitch that he handed over to the guardian of the vineyard a belt ornamented with gold, which he was wearing, in exchange for the half-ripe grapes he had picked from his vines, and thereby indemnified himself against punishment. He considered that the guardian's acceptance of the belt from him, and his letting him go free, was an act of grace the guardian had bestowed on him and a kind act he had accorded him.

It is said that Hurmuz was a successful and victorious commander, who never set his hand to anything that he did not attain. He was, moreover, well educated, skillful, and shrewd, but bad intentioned, a defect he inherited from his maternal relations, the Turks. He removed the nobles [from his court and entourage] and killed 13,600 men from the religious classes and from those of good family and noble birth. His sole aim was to win over the lower classes and to make them favorably disposed towards him. He imprisoned a great number of the great men, and degraded them and stripped them of their offices and ranks. He provide well 698. This story also in al-Dīnawārī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 77–78.

for the mass of troops (al-jund), but deprived the cavalrymen (al-asāwirah) of resources. Hence a great number of those in his entourage became evil intentioned toward him, as a consequence of the fact that God wished to change their (i.e., the Persians') rule and transfer their royal power to someone else. Everything has its own particular cause.699

The Hērbadhs presented Hurmuz with a petition that embodied their desire to persecute the Christians. The king endorsed the document with the words, "Just as our royal throne cannot stand on its two front legs without the two back ones, our kingdom cannot stand or endure firmly if we cause the Christians and adherents of other faiths, who differ in belief from ourselves, to become hostile to us. So renounce this desire to persecute the Christians and become assiduous in good works, so that the Christians and the adherents of other faiths may see this, praise you for it, and feel themselves drawn toward your religion."700

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: The Turks marched out against Hurmuz. Other authorities state that, in the eleventh year of his reign, Shābah, the supreme ruler of the Turks,701 advanced against him with three hundred 699. Cf. al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 78, and Al-Maṣʿūdi, Murūj, II, 211–12, the latter source stating that Hormizd killed thirteen thousand from the upper classes (al-khawāṣṣ) of Persia and destroyed the bases of the Zoroastrian state church. The asāwirah or mailed, heavy cavalrymen were recruited from the classes of the nobility and gentry (see n. 258 above), while what is here called the jund represented the infantry and other less favored elements of the forces.

---

700. As mentioned in n. 696 above, Nestorian Christian sources give a favorable picture of Hormizd and his policies.

701. Shābah (if this is the correct form of a dubiously written name) was more probably a ruler of the northern Hephthalites, or a vassal ruler in the upper Oxus regions of the Turkish, rather than the Qaghan of the Western Turks. In the 580s, Tardu (Chinese, Ta-t’ou), son of Ishtemi or Istemi (see n. 394 above), was Qaghan of what the Chinese knew as the Western Frontier Region, with Central Asia stricto sensu and the fringes of Transoxania controlled by other members of the Turkish ruling house, Taspar (or Taghpar), son of Bumin (r. 572–81), then Nivar (Chinese, She-tu), who was ousted by Apa, son of Muhan (Chinese, Ta-lo-pien), who in 583 founded the state of the Western Turks, until he lost power in 587. See Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Turk Empire," 304–306; Sinor and S. G. Klyashtorny, "The Turk Empire," 333–34. None of these names resembles that of Shābah, and these Turkish potentates were in any case too heavily involved in internal warfare and internecine rivalries within Inner Asia to have begun hostilities with an external power like the Sāsānids.
thousand warriors until he reached Bādhghis and Harāt;\(^702\) that the king of the Byzantines moved into the outer districts of his empire (\(al-\text{dawāḩīl}\)) with eighty thousand warriors heading toward him;\(^703\) and that the king of the Khazars moved with a large army toward al-Bāb wa-al-Abwāb (i.e., Darband), wreaking damage and \(^702\) Bādhghis is the region of what is now northwestern Afghanistan lying to the north of Herat, the name being known, in the form Waîtigaesa, since Avestan times. See Yaqūt, \(Buldān\), I, 318; Marquart, \(Erānšahr\), 64–65, 67, 70, 77–78; Le Strange, \(Lands\), 412–13; Barthold, \(Historical Geography\), 47–49; Elr, s.v. Bādhghis or Bādhghis (W. Barthold and F. R. Allchin), \(Elr\), s.v Bādgī, I. General and the early period (C. E. Bosworth).

\(^703\) The course of Perso-Byzantine relations after the war of 540–45 between Khusraw Anūsharwān and Justinian (see al-\(Ṭ\)abārī, I, 958–60, p. 252–55 above) until this point is not noted by al-\(Ṭ\)abārī but was in fact very eventful. There was a prolonged war in Lazica, the westernmost, coastal region of Georgia, the Colchis of Antiquity, from 549 to 561, in which Persia, endeavoring to extend her influence over Armenia and Georgia, had confronted Byzantium, equally concerned to assert a protectorate over these Christian kingdoms (for Sasanid policy in Persarmenia, that part of eastern Armenia where the Persians claimed control, see \(Elr\), s.v. Armenia and Iran. ii. The Pre-Islamic Period. 6. The Sasanian Period. II: Persarmenia [M.L. Chaumont]), and this formed the second of Anūsharwān's wars with the Greeks. The peace treaty of 561, the negotiations for which are described in detail by the Greek historian Menander Protector, giving the text of the Greek version of the treaty in extenso, and whose chief Persian representative in them was Izadh-Gushnasp (later to be a partisan of Bahram Chūḥīn's, see al-\(Ṭ\)abārī, I, 997, p. 307 below), provided for a fifty years' peace, on analogy with that of 422 between Theodosius II and Bahram V Gūr, involving Byzantium's paying an annual tribute in return for Persia's renouncing all rights over Lazica and consequent access to the Black Sea. There was also a commercial clause by means of which both powers aimed at controlling—with the imposition of appropriate customs dues—trade conducted by Arab merchants from the Persian Gulf shores and across the Syrian Desert, and a military clause that seems to have aimed at preventing intertribal, or rather, interdynastic hostilities between the respective Arab allies of the Byzantines and Persians, the Jāmids/Ghassānids and the Lakhmids (see Shahid, "The Arabs in the Peace Treaty of 561," 191–211).

Justinian's expansionist efforts during his long reign were largely concentrated on the west of his empire, and he had been generally content to maintain the status quo in the east. But his nephew and successor Justin II (r. 567–78), having lost much of Italy to the Germanic Lombards who invaded the Po valley in 568, looked to the east for compensatory military glory. Hence the fifty years' peace lasted only ten years. In 572 Justin renounced payment of the tribute and intervened in Armenia to support a revolt of local Christians against the persecutions and attempts to impose Zoroastrianism of the Persian Marzbān Chihr-Gushnasp from the prominent Suren family. By supporting the Armenian rebels, Justin hoped to take advantage of Anūsharwān's preoccupations in the east with the Turkish Khāqān Sinjībū (see al-\(Ṭ\)abārī, I, 895–96, pp. 152–53 above).

The result was a third war which began with a Persian invasion of Syria, capturing Daras/Dārā and threatening Antioch. The war dragged on for twenty years, destruction. They further state that two men from the Arabs, one called 'Abbās the Squinter and the other 'Amr the Blue-Eyed One, encamped with a mighty host of Arabs on the banks of the Euphrates and mounted raids against the inhabitants of the Sawād. His enemies became emboldened against him and despite an armistice of 575-78 negotiated on the Persian side by the commander Māhābūd (whose son Basak (?) is named in al-Tabarī, I, 985, p. 291 above, as the fortifier of al-Mushaqar in eastern Arabia) and on the Greek side by Tiberius (who became emperor as Tiberius II Constantine, r. 578-82, but who was already Caesar and acting emperor after Justin lapsed into insanity in December 574). The truce enabled the Magister Militum per Orientem Maurice (subsequently emperor, r. 582-602) to build up his forces for a campaign in the east in 578, but this was preempted by a Persian invasion, under the general Māhābūd, of the Armenian Taurus region, checked by a counterattack of Maurice which carried the Byzantine offensive as far as the region of Adiabene in northern Mesopotamia. Attempts at a further peace between Tiberius and Anūsharwān were aborted by the Persian king's sudden death in spring 579, for his successor Hormizd preferred to break off relations and continue the war; a sticking-point was the Byzantines' continued refusal to extradite the Armenian leaders of the 572 revolt in Persarmenia.

With the resumption of hostilities, Maurice prepared for war, and now in 580 aimed at involving the Jafīd/Ghassānīd al-Mundhir b. al-Hārith (r. 569-82) in warfare along the Syrian Desert fringes (see Nöldeke, Die Ghassānischen Fürsten, 27-28; Shahīd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 396ff.). After further peace negotiations in 580-81 failed, the Byzantine army under Maurice secured resounding victories in Upper Mesopotamia, including at Constantina/Tall Mawzan, but was still unable to capture the key fortresses of Nisibin and Daras/Dārā. The war then continued through Hormizd's reign, with the Byzantine armies commanded by Maurice's brother-in-law Philippicus, by Priscus and then by Philippicus again till 589, and with fighting concentrated upon such points as Amida/Amid, Martyropolis/Mayyāfāriqin, and Daras/Dārā. In 589 Hormizd ordered Bahram Chubin (on whom see n. 706 below), fresh from his victories in the east against the Hephthalites, to invade Siunik' (the region between Lake Sevan and the middle course of the Araxes/Aras river) but Bahram suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of the Byzantine general Romanus; it was apparently Hormizd's humiliating treatment of the momentarily unsuccessful, but until then highly successful, Bahram (the Greek historians state that the emperor sent to him women's garments, emblems of weakness and cowardice, while Bahram responded with a letter addressed to his sovereign merely as "Hormizd, son of Khusraw"), which finally provoked him into rebellion against the king.

raided his lands. They so encompassed his lands that these last became known as a sieve with many holes. It is further said that enemies had encompassed the land of Persia from all sides like the bowstring over the two curved ends of the bow. Shābah, king of the Turks, sent a message to Hurmuz and the great men of the Persians, announcing his advance with his troops and saying, "Put in good repair the bridges over the rivers and wadis so that I may cross over them to your land, and construct bridges over all those rivers which do not already have them. Also, do likewise regarding all the rivers and wadis that lie along my route from your land to that of the Byzantines, because I have determined on marching against them from your land."

Hurmuz became very fearful at all these threats coming upon him, and sought counsel regarding them. The decision was reached for him to move against the king of the Turks. So Hurmuz sent against him a man from the people of al-Rayy called Bahram, son of Bahrām Jushnas, known as Jūbin, with twelve thousand men whom Bahrām had personally selected—mature and experienced men, not youngsters.706 It is stated alternatively that Hur-

_Dawâhī_, sing. _dāhiyah_, literally, "exposed, outer side," was a term specially used in early Islamic times for the zones of advanced frontier defenses marking the Byzantine-Arab frontier in the Taurus region of southeastern Anatolia.

704. It does seem that the Khazars had become established in the eastern Caucasus region by the later sixth century, see Dunlop, _The History of the Jewish Khazars_, 43–45; but we have no precise historical mention of this invasion.

705. These two contemptuous and pejorative names (blueness = haggardness, lividness, or blue-eyedness, being regarded as a defect, reflected in the linking of the color with the mujrimīn or sinners at the Last Judgment in Qur'ān, XX, 102) may well be fictitious ones. Nothing is otherwise known of these two raiders from the desert except that al-Mas‘ūdī, _Murūj_, II, 212 = § 633, gives 'Amr the further sobriquet of _al-Afwah_, "the big-mouthed one," and unhelpfully says that the raiders came from the direction of Yemen.

706. Bahrain Chubin (literally "wooden," but explicable, according to A. Sh.
Shahbazi, see below, from his tall and slender physique, hence with the sense of "lance, javelin shaft") stemmed from the great family of Mihrān (see al-Ṭabarî, I, 885, p. 131 and n. 340 above) in Rayy and was commander on the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānid realm. His military exploits in the east and his subsequent usurpation of royal power made such an impression on popular consciousness that there arose a popular romance in Pahlavi, the no longer extant _Wahrām Cōbēn-nāmag_.
This romance, together with a _Book of Rustam and Isfandiyār_, was translated into Arabic by a secretary of "Hishām" (the Umayyad caliph Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik?), one Jabalah b. Sālim. See Ibn al-Nadīm, _Fihrist_, 305, 364, tr. Bayard Dodge, II, 589, 716; Nöldeke, _trans_. 474–48, _Excursus 6_; Christensen, _Romanen om Bahram Tschobin, et rekonstruktionsforsøg_. In his own time, Bahrām had been hailed by muz mustered at that time all those in his capital registered on the diwān rolls (al-diwañiyyah),707 amounting to seventy thousand warriors. Bahram advanced rapidly with the troops who had joined him until he had passed Harat and Bādhghīs. Shābah was unaware of Bahram’s presence until the latter fixed his encampment in his vicinity. Messages went backward and forward between them, and clashes of arms, and Bahram killed Shābah with an arrow shot at him. It is said that, in the realm of the Persians, supreme skill in archery was attributed to three men: Arish’s shot in the war between Manūshihr and Afrasiyāb (text, “Firasiyat”);708 Sūkhrā’s shot in the war against the Turks;709 and this shot of Bahram’s. He declared Shābah’s encampment to be lawful booty, and established himself in that place. B.r.mūdhah,710 Shābah’s many as something of a messianic figure who was to save the Sasanid kingdom from chaos and to restore the glories of his Arsacid forebears, although subsequent writings on the downfall of the Sasanid kingdom, written in Pahlavi and stemming from the early Islamic period, generally take what might be called a Persian legitimist view and portray Bahram as a base-born usurper whose actions contributed to the decline and confusion of the state in its last decades. See K. Czeglédy, “Bahram Cōbin and the Persian Apocalyptic Literature,” 32–43, and on him in general, Nödeke, trans. 270 n. 3; Christensen, Sassanides, 443–45; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians,” 163–65; EIr, s.v. Bahram (Cl. Huart and H. Massé); EIr, s.v. Bahram. vii. Bahram VI Cōbin (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

707. An anachronistic use of the Islamic administrative term, that used to denote the register of names of the Arab muqātilah or warriors and their pay allotments, the system instituted, so the story goes, by the caliph ʿUmar I, although the word itself is assumed to stem ultimately from Old Persian dipi-,” “document, inscription,” but probably with even older antecedents. See EIr, s.v. Divān. i. The term (F. C. de Blois), and also al-Ṭabarī, I, 877, p. 116 above, where diwān is used for the king Firūz’s perpatetic exchequer.

708. Thus in Nödeke’s text, but N. e offers a variety of readings from the manuscripts, with Marquart, in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, following Darmesteter, offering also Irīshshibātīr. For his translation, 271, Nödeke chose from among the various readings Arishshātīn. The first element of the name is clearly the personal name Arish, the MP form of Avestan Erāxša-, of uncertain meaning. In Iranian legendary history, Arish or Kay Arish, the Avestan Kawī Arshan, was the celebrated archer who shot an arrow a prodigious distance to establish the boundary between Iran and Afrasiyab’s Turan, as mentioned here. The Arsacids traced their descent back to Kay Arish, regarded in the Pahlavi sources as the grandson of Kay Kawād. See Nödeke, trans. 271 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 29–30, 88–89; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, 38 no. 114; Yarshater, “Iranian National History,” 373, 406, 444, 475. Nödeke was, however, unable to suggest any plausible explanation of the second element sātīn (or however it should be read).

709. See I, 877, p. 116 above, for this incident.

710. Again a doubtful rendering of a name that does not look very Turkish in its son, who was the equal of his father, marched against Bahrām. Bahrām attacked him, put him to flight, and besieged him in a certain fortress of his. Bahrām pressed Bahrāmūdah so hard that he surrendered to him. Bahrām sent him back captive to Hurmuz and plundered immense treasures that were laid up in the fortress. It is said that he transported to Hurmuz wealth, jewels, vessels, weapons, and other plundered items amounting to two hundred fifty-thousand camels’ loads. Hurmuz thanked Bahrām for the booty he had gained and which had reached him.

However, Bahrām was afraid of Hurmuz’s violence, as were the troops who were with him, so he threw off allegiance to Hurmuz, advanced toward al-Mada’in, showed vexation at Hurmuz’s behavior, and proclaimed that Hurmuz’s son Abarwīz was more fitted for the royal power than he. Certain of those in Hurmuz’s court circle threw in their lot with the rebels. For this reason Abarwīz, fearing Hurmuz, fled to Azerbaijan; a number of the Marzbāns and Iṣḥabbadhs joined him there and gave him their allegiance. The great men and the nobles at al-Mada’in, including Bindūyah (text, “Bind!”) and Bīstām, maternal uncles of Abarwīz, rose up, deposed Hurmuz, blinded him with a red-hot needle but left him alive, shrinking from the crime of actually killing him. 711

711. Bindūyah (a hypocoristic from Winda-[farnah?] “possessing royal glory,” see Justi, Namenbuch, 368–69, 370–71) and Bīstām (see on this name n. 237 above) were members of one of the seven greatest families of Persia, regarded as almost on a level with the families of the Arsacids and Sāsanids, that of Spābadh. Their father Shabur had been killed by Hormīz in his purge of magnates of the realm whom he regarded with suspicion (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 990, p. 297 above), hence the revenge of the two sons in this rebellion against the king. See Nöldeke, trans. 273 n. 1, 439 Excursus 3; EIr, s.v. Bēstām o Bendōy (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

The mode of blinding mentioned here (Ar. samala, Pers. mil kashidan) was often employed in order to avoid physical desecration or disfiguring of the body of a person invested with the divinely buttressed aura of kingship, etc. Procopius, The Persian War, I.vi.17, states that the Persians used either to pour boiling olive oil into the victim’s wide-open eyes or else to prick the eyeballs with a heated needle. Al-Ṭabarī, I, 998, p. 310 below, and other sources state further that Hormīz was shortly afterward murdered, either directly on Khusraw Abarwīz’s orders, as the Byzantine chronicler Theophylactus Simocatta alleges, or with his complicity, as News of this reached Abarwiz, and he set out from Azerbaijan, with his retinue, for the capital, hastening to get there before Bahram. Having arrived at al-Mada'in, Abarwiz seized the royal power and prepared to defend himself against Bahram. The two of them met together on the bank of the Nahrawan river, where disputation and confrontation took place between them. Abarwiz sought to convince Bahram that he would guarantee his security, exalt him in rank, and raise the status of his governorship; but Bahram would not accept that.

Various battles took place between them, until Abarwiz was compelled to flee to Byzantium, seeking help from its king, after a fierce battle and a night attack launched by both sides. It is said that Bahram had with him a detachment of especially strong troops, including a group of three of the leading Turkish warriors, unequalled among the rest of the Turks for their equestrian skills and their strength, who had undertaken to Bahram that they would kill Abarwiz. On the morning after the night attack, Abarwiz stood firm and summoned his troops to give battle to Bahram, but they were reluctant to stir. The group of three Turks attacked him, but Abarwiz went out to engage them and killed them one by one with his own hand. He then abandoned the battlefield, aware that his followers had been reluctant to fight and were wavering in their allegiance. He went to his father at Ctesiphon, entered his presence, told him what was apparent to him regarding his troops' attitude, and sought his advice. Hurmuz advised him to make his way to Mawriq (Maurice), the king of the Byzantines, in order to seek help from him. He placed his womenfolk and children in a place secure from Bahram and set off with a small number of companions, including Binduyah, Bisṭām and Kurdi, brother of Bahram Chubin. He reached Antioch, and wrote to al-Ṭabari says. See Christensen, Sassanides, 444.

712. That is, the canal that ran a two hundred miles' course, parallel to and eastward of the Tigris, from near Takrit in the north to Madharāyā in the south. See further on the region of Nahrawan n. 615 above.

713. As Noldeke, trans. 273 n. 1, and 274 n. 2, observed, the course of all these events, which were to culminate in Khusraw Abarwiz's triumph over Bahram Chubin, is extremely confused in the sources, with Theophylactus having the clearest and fullest narrative here. See Christensen, Sassanides, 444-45; EIr, s.v. Bahram. vii. Bahram VI Çobin (A. Sh. Shahbazi).
Mawriq. The latter received him and gave him in marriage his daughter, called Maryam (Mary), who was very precious to him. The complete extent of Hurmuz, son of Kiswa's reign was, according to certain authorities, eleven years, nine months, and ten days, and according to Hishām b. Muḥammad, twelve years.714

[Kiswa II Abarwīz]

Then there assumed the royal power Kiswa Abarwīz.715 [He was] the son of Hurmuz, the son of Kiswa Anūsharwan, and was one of the outstanding kings of the dynasty in regard to bravery, one of them with the most incisive judgment, and one with the most far-sighted perceptions. According to what has been mentioned, his strength in battle, valor, successfulness, victoriousness, accumulation of wealth and treasuries, the assistance to his cause of fate and of the times, reached a pitch that had never been vouchsafed to any king more exalted than he. Hence he was called Abarwīz, meaning in Arabic "The Victorious One."

---

714. For more detailed comment on these events, including Bahram's revolt, Khusraw Abarwēz's appeal to the Byzantine emperor Maurice, and his alleged marriage to a Byzantine princess, see the second, fuller narrative of these events by al-Ṭabarī at I, 995ff., pp. 305ff. below.

715. MP abarwēz, NP parwēz, "victorious." See Justi, Namenbuch, 19; Nöldke, trans. 275 n. 3. This point is the beginning of the second, fuller narrative of events surrounding the deposition of Hormizd, the revolt of Bahram Chubin and the eventual triumph of Khusraw Abarwēz.
It is mentioned that, when he became apprehensive of what his father Hurmuz intended, on account of the scheming of Bahrām Jūbīn over this, and when it had reached the point that Hurmuz imagined that Abarwiz was planning to seize the royal power for himself, Abarwiz left secretly for Azerbaijan. Subsequently, he proclaimed his cause openly there. When he reached that region, a group of the Iṣbahbadhs and others who were there rallied to him and gave him their allegiance, promising to give him aid, but he made no [positive] steps toward that. It is also said that, when Ādhīn Jushnas, who had been sent to combat Bahrām Jūbīn, was killed, the army accompanying Ādhīn Jushnas scattered and finally made its way to al-Mada’in. Jūbīn pursued them, and Hurmuz’s position became very unsure. Ādhīn Jushnas’s sister, who had been the youthful companion of Abarwiz, wrote to him, informing him of Hurmuz’s weak position as a result of what had happened to Ādhīn Jushnas and telling him that the great men of state had resolved upon deposing Hurmuz. She further told him that, if Jūbīn reached al-Mada’in before he could get there, Jūbīn would occupy it. When the letter reached Abarwiz, he gathered together all the troops he could from Armenia and Azerbaijan, and with them marched on al-Mada’in. The leading figures and nobles rallied to him, full of joy at his arrival. He assumed the royal crown and seated himself on his throne. He said: “It is part of our religion to choose piety [above all other things], and part of our considered opinion to do good works. Our grandfather Kisra, son of Qubādh, was like a parent for you, and our father Hurmuz was a just judge for you; so ensure that you remain obedient and submissive now.”

On the third day, Abarwiz went to his father, prostrated himself before him and said, “May God grant you long life, O king! You know that I am innocent of what your false-hearted subjects (literally, “hypocrites,” munāfīqūn) did to you. I went into hiding and made for Azerbaijan out of fear that you had the intention to kill me.” Hurmuz gave credence to this apology, saying, “O my dear son, I have two requests to make of you, so aid me in implementing these. The first one is that you should take vengeance on my behalf upon those who took part in my deposition and blinding, and that you should show no mercy toward them. The second one is that you should appoint every day three persons of firm judgment to keep me company and that you should instruct them to come into my presence.” Abarwiz showed himself humble and submissive toward him, and said, “O king, may God grant you long life! The rebel Bahram is threatening us from very near and has on his side courage and bravery; we do not at present have the power to stretch forth our hand against those who perpetrated what they did against you, but if God gives me the upper hand over the false-hearted one, then I shall act as your representative and the willing agent of your hand.”

716. This name appears variously in the sources. Nöldeke adopted his reading here, see trans. 276 n. 2, on a basis of the readings of al-Ṭabarī and al-Ya’qūbī alone among the sources. Justi, Namenbuch. 5, 354–55, interpreted this putative name as from ādhīn “ornament” + gushnasp “strong, powerful.” But Mr F. C. de Blois has pointed out that Justi’s translation is certainly wrong: rather, for ādhīn read MP ṣwēn “manner, custom” [NP āṭīn], while gushnasp means “stallion” and is also the name of a sacred fire. He suggests that a rendering *Ādur-gushnasp would make better sense here.
717. Correcting the name Bahrām of the text to Hurmuz, as in Addenda et emendanda, p. xxciv, and Nöldeke, trans. 276.

Bahram got news of Kisra’s approach and of how the people had made Abarwiz king. He hastened toward al-Madain with his troops. Abarwiz sent out spies against him. When Bahram drew near to him, Abarwiz thought that the best course was to negotiate with him peaceably. So he girded on his weapons, and ordered Binduyah, Bistam, a group of the great men whom he trusted, and a thousand men of his troops to put on their best array and gird on their weapons. Abarwiz set out from his fortress with them against Bahram, with the people calling down blessings on his head, and surrounded by Binduyah, Bistam, and all the other leading figures until he halted on the bank of the Nahrawan river. When Bahram perceived the full extent of Abarwiz’s panoply, he set out on a piebald mount (birdhawn . . . ablaq), which he especially held dear, wearing no mailed coat and accompanied by Izadh Jushnas and three men who were kinsmen of the king of the Turks. These last had pledged their lives to Bahram that they would hand over to him Abarwîz as a prisoner, and he had given them extensive wealth as payment for this.

718. That is, on Binduyah, Bistam, and their allies, see al-Tabari, I, 993, p. 303 above.
719. That is, izad “God” + gushnasp [see n. 716 above]; see Justi, Namenbuch, 145-46, 354-55.

When Bahram saw Kisra’s fine figure, his splendid outfit, his crown going with him, accompanied by the unfurled banner of Kâwah (dirâfsh-i Kâbiyân), their supremely mighty flag,\(^{720}\) and when he saw Bindûyâh, Bisôtâm, and the rest of the great men, their fine weapons, their splendor, and their mounts, he became downcast at all this, and commented to his companions, “Do you not see that the son of a whore has put on flesh and grown fat, has made the transition from youth to manhood experience, has acquired an ample beard and a full-grown mustache,\(^{721}\) and his body has become stout.” While he was uttering these words, having stationed himself on the bank of the Nahrawân river, Kisra said to one of those standing with him, “Which of these is Bahram?” One of Bahram’s brothers called Kurdi, who had never wavered in his allegiance to Abarwîz and had remained one of his followers, said, “May God grant you long life, the man on the piebald steed!” Kisra began his speech with the following words: “O Bahram, you are one of the supports of our kingdom and a pillar for our subjects; you have exerted yourself nobly in our service. We have seen fit to choose some day auspicious for you\(^{722}\) in order to appoint you to \(^{720}\) This banner is said to have been originally the apron of the blacksmith Kâwah who, in the Iranian national epic, led a successful revolt against the tyrant Zohâk, although the legend is, according to Christensen, of comparatively late, Sasanid origin. By that time, it was equated with the royal standard of the Persian kings, and several Arabic authors (e.g., al-Ṭabarî, I, 2174–75; al-Mas‘ûdî, Murût, IV, 224–§ 1556; al-Khwârazmî, Mafàtiḥ al-‘ulûm, 115) purport to describe it. By the time of these authors, however, the banner had long ceased to exist, being captured, according to the historians, at the decisive battle of al-Qâdisiyah between the Persians and Arabs in 15/636 or 16/637. See Nöldeke, trans. 278 n. 1; Christensen, Les Kayanides, 43; idem, Sassanides, 502–504; E12, s.v. Kâwah [Ed.].

---

\(^{721}\) Following the preferred reading of the Sprenger ms. shâribithî [text, n. c], for the text’s shabãbihi.

\(^{722}\) That is, auspicious from the astrological aspect. It is emphasized in later Islamic literature, and, in particular, in the works of the third/ninth-century author al-Jâhiç of Başrah and apocryphal works attributed to him, that hemerology, the skill of choosing auspicious days for planned actions, had in considerable measure passed to the Arabs from the Persians, with the official astrologers already significant figures at the Sasanid court. In the Kitâb al-tâ’î or Kitâb akhlâq al-‘ulûm, attributed (but almost certainly falsely) to al-Jâhiç, it is stated that when Ardashîr I Pâbagân divided up Persian society into four classes (an item of information that figures extensively in the sources; see Marlow, Hierarchy and Egalitar-the office of Ḥibahbadh of the whole land of Persia." Bahram, however, replied, "But I have chosen for you a day for crucifying you!" Kisra was filled with trepidation, even though nothing of it showed in his face. Bahram said to Abarwiz, "O son of an adulteress, raised in the tents of the Kurds!" and other words like it, and accepted nothing whatever of what Abarwiz had offered him. There was mention of Arish, Bahram's forefather, and Abarwiz reproached him over Arish's obedience to Abarwiz’s own forefather Manushihr.\footnote{On Arish, see n. 708 above, where is mentioned the claims of the Arsacids, Bahram’s alleged forebears, to descent from the Kay Arish of Iranian legendary history.} The two of them separated, each one showing the most violent hostility to the other.

Bahram had a sister called Kurdiyah, one of the most accomplished of women and most endowed of them with qualities, whom he had married.\footnote{As Nöldeke observed, trans. 279 n. 6, such a marriage would be allowable and even praiseworthy in Zoroastrian law and custom, though repugnant to the Muslim Firdawsi, who suppresses mention of it in the Shah-namah. It would also have been unacceptable to the pre-Islamic Arabs; see Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 164.} She reproached Bahram for his evil speech adressed to Kisra and his attempt to bring him under his own obedience, but he would have none of it. A martial engagement between Kisra and Bahram took place. It is said that, on the morning after the night battle, Kisra sallied forth for combat in person. The three Turks saw him and made for him, but Abarwiz killed them with his own hand. He urged on his troops to battle, but perceived that they were flagging. He decided to go to some other monarch and seek military help from him. He went first to his father [Hurmuz], seeking his advice; Hurmuz considered that Abarwiz’s best course was to make his way to the king of the Byzantines. He placed his womenfolk in a secure place and set out with a small body of men, including Binduyah, Bistam, and Bahram’s brother Kurdi. When they left al-Mada’in, the mass of Abarwiz’s supporters (al-qawm), however, were afraid that Bahram would restore Hurmuz to the royal power and write to the king of the Byzantines on his behalf that Abarwiz’s delegation be sent back so that they might be put to death. They told this to Abarwiz and sought permission from him to kill Hurmuz; but he made no reply. Hence Binduyah, Bistam, and some of their followers went to Hurmuz, strangled him to death, and then returned to Kisra. They said, "You can now proceed under the best possible auguries." 725

They urged on their mounts and came to the Euphrates, crossed it, and took the way through the desert under the guidance of a man called Khurshidhan, 726 arriving at a certain monastery on the edge of the cultivated land. While they encamped in the courtyard there, a cavalry squadron of Bahram's, commanded by a man called Bahram, son of Siyawush, came upon them by surprise. Once they became aware of this, Binduyah woke Abarwiz from his slumber and told him, "Use some stratagem [for escaping], for the enemy are on top of you." Kisra replied, "I have no means of escaping," so Binduyah told him that he would sacrifice his own life for him, and asked him to hand over his weapons and equipment and to flee with his retainers from the monastery. They did this, and hurried on ahead of the enemy until they were able to conceal themselves in the mountains. When Bahram, son of Siyawush, arrived, Binduyah, girded with Abarwiz's weapons and equipment, showed himself to Bahram from the top of the monastery, and let Bahram thereby imagine that he was Abarwiz. He asked Bahram to grant him a respite until the next morning, when he would peacefully deliver himself into his hands. Hence Bahram left him alone and only later was his stratagem revealed. Bahram, son of Siyawush, took Binduyah back with him to Jūbin, who consigned Binduyah to imprisonment in Bahram's custody.

It is said that Bahram [Jūbin] entered the royal palaces at al-Madā'in and sat down on the royal throne. The prominent leaders and great men of state gathered round him, and Bahram addressed

---

725. These words, and those of other sources, no doubt express the degree of Khusraw's complicity in his father's killing: satisfaction with the result without having to stain his own hands with blood. Khusraw's conduct here was certainly Machiavellian; Nöldeke, 281 n. 1, adds the parallel of the Russian emperor Alexander I, who in 1801 certainly had prior knowledge of the planned murder of his father Paul I.

726. That is, Khursādē, Avestan hvar-xšāēta, literally "sun." See Justi, Namenbuch, 180; Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, col. 1848.
them, abusing Abarwiz violently and blaming him. Several sessions of argument and disputation took place between him and the prominent leaders, all of whom were averse to him. Nevertheless, Bahram seated himself on the royal throne and had himself crowned, and the people gave him obedience out of fear. It is said that Bahram, son of Siyawush, agreed with Binduyah on assassinating Jübin, but the latter got to know about it, and had Bahram, son of Siyawush, executed. Binduyah, however, escaped and managed to reach Azerbaijan.

Abarwiz journeyed onward until he reached Antioch, and from there wrote to Mawriq, the king of the Byzantines, sending to him a delegation of his retainers and asking him for military aid.728

727. Bahram Chubin entered Ctesiphon in summer 590. There was clearly a reluctance among the great men of state in the capital that the ancient house of the Sasanids should be set aside by Bahram. The latter, for his part, claimed to be the restorer of the even more ancient house of the Arsacids, who had been displaced by the upstart Ardashir I b. Sasan, son of a mere shepherd, and he took advantage of apocalyptic beliefs which, so he asserted, foretold himself as the future savior of the land of Iran from such external foes as the Byzantines and the Hephthalites. In Ctesiphon he assumed the complete royal style, being crowned and issuing coins, although according to Theophylactus and al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ɪtawāl, 90, he hedged his bets by proclaiming to the nobles that he was only acting as regent for Hormizd’s young son Shahriyar until the latter should reach maturity. Despite his efforts, Bahram was never able to persuade the Persian aristocracy and the Zoroastrian clergy that he held a social position above their own or that he enjoyed the divine favor, and a strong party of them continued to favor the cause of Khusraw Abarwiz as successor to his father. Bahram had accordingly to turn to other elements for support, including that of the Jews; subsequently, Khusraw’s commander Mahbodh slaughtered many Jews in retaliation. See Neusner, “Jews in Iran,” 916.

Bahram VI Chubin reigned in Ctesiphon 590–91. His name appears on his coins as VRHR’N. See on his coins, Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 66–67, 385–86, 483–84, Plate XX, Table XXVII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 52, Table XI, Plate 12; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 148–49; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 237.

See on his career and reign Nöeldeke, trans. 283 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 444–45; Czeglédy, “Bahram Chubin and the Persian Apocalyptic Literature,” 25–27; Elr, s.v. Bahram. vii. Bahram VI Chubin (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

728. Both the exact date of Khusraw Abarwiz’s appeal to Maurice and the exact route he followed from the Persian capital to the Byzantine lands present certain problems. However, it seems likely that the date was the late spring of 590. Antioch, mentioned here by al-Ṭabari as the place to which Khusraw fled, was deep in Byzantine territory, and it is much more probable, on the basis of fairly exact itineraries in Theophylactus and the Anonymus Guidi, that Khusraw and his entourage traveled from the region of Ctesiphon up the Euphrates valley via Firūz-
Mawrīq agreed to this, and things went so far that he gave Abarwiz his daughter Maryam in marriage and had her conveyed to him.\textsuperscript{729} Furthermore, he sent to Abarwiz his brother Thiādhus (Theodosius)\textsuperscript{730} with an army of sixty thousand warriors, headed by a man called Sarjis (Sergius), who was [in practice] in charge of all the army’s affairs, and another man whose strength was equal to a thousand men.\textsuperscript{731} He laid down as conditions that Abarwiz should Shāpūr/al-Anbār, Hit and ‘Anah to Circesium/Qargisiya at the confluence of the Khābūr and Euphrates, the first fortified point within Byzantine territory.

Bahram had tried to purchase Byzantine neutrality in the struggle by offering to cede Nišibin and the lands held by the Persians right up to the Tigris. But Maurice must have felt that it was better for Byzantine interests to have a young and inexperienced Khusraw Abarwiz on the throne than the battle-hardened warrior Bahram, and he may also have hoped to extract concessions for the Christians within the Persian realm if Khusraw were to prevail. At all events, Maurice disregarded the advice of the Senate in Constantinople, which was suspicious of affording any help to the ancestral foe, and a Byzantine army to be commanded by the Magister Militum Narses was promised as aid for Khusraw. See Bury, \textit{A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene}, II, 112; Higgins, \textit{The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (582–602)}, Part I, 42–54; Goubert, \textit{Byzance avant l’Islam}, I, 131–45.

\textsuperscript{729} As Noldeke pointed out, trans. 283 n. 2, the Persian historical tradition and later romantic literature makes this Byzantine princess the mother of Khusraw Abarwiz’s son and successor Kawād II Shērōy, whereas the Greek sources do not mention her. Noldeke did not at the time when he made his translation of al-Ṭabarī know of the Syriac \textit{Anonymus Guidi} (the earlier, greater part of which may, it has recently been suggested, have been written by Elias of Marw: personal communication from Dr. Sebastian Brock). This chronicle does in fact, mention her as one of Khusraw’s two Christian wives (see trans. Noldeke, 10). Another Syriac chronicle like Dionysius of Tell Mahrē records the marriage with much circumstantial detail, e.g., that she was accompanied to the Persian capital by bishops and clergy and that Khusraw built for her two places of worship (haykle), one dedicated to St. Sergius and the other to Mary, the Mother of Jesus (see trans. Palmer, \textit{The Seventh Century in the West-Syrian Chronicles}, 117). It seems that there was some confusion between the Byzantine princess Maria and the celebrated Shirin, Khusraw’s beloved, the subject of so many later Persian romances, and Theophylactus makes Sīrē likewise of Byzantine origin. However, Shirīn is said by the \textit{Anonymus Guidi}, loc. cit., to have been of Aramaean origin from the district around what was later al-Ɓasrah. As the mother of Khusraw’s son Mardān Shāh and the mother or foster mother of another son, Shahriyar, she showed herself hostile to Shērōy after her husband’s death. The historicity of Khusraw’s supposed marriage with Maria must remain very dubious. See von Gutschmid, “Bemerkungen zu Tabari’s Sasanidengeschichte,” 744; Labourt, \textit{Le Christianisme dans l’empire perse}, 208–209; Garsolian, “Byzantium and the Sasanians,” 579.

\textsuperscript{730} Noldeke, trans. 284 n. 1, corrected “brother” to “son,” as in al-Dinawari, \textit{al-Akhbār al-tiwal}, 92, and later Persian sources.

\textsuperscript{731} al-Dinawari, \textit{al-Akhbār al-tiwal}, 92, speaks of “ten men from among the treat him with respect and cease requiring the tribute his forefathers had exacted from the kings of the Byzantines. When the Byzantine troops reached Abarwīz, he was filled with joy and allowed them five days' rest after their arrival. Then he reviewed them and appointed officers ('urafa') over them. The army included in its numbers Thiyādhūs, Sarjis, and the champion warrior who was the equal of a thousand men. He went with them until he reached Azerbaijan and encamped on a plain called al-Danaq (?).732 Binduyah and a man from the Isbhabadhs of that region called Mūshī733 with forty thousand warriors met up with him there, and people from Fārs, Isbahān, and Khurāsān rushed734 to Abarwīz's standard.

Bahram got news of Abarwīz's taking up his position on the plain of al-Danaq and set out toward him from al-Madā‘īn. Several vViolent clashes took place between them in which the Byzantine champion was killed. It is said that Abarwīz engaged Bahram's forces, quite separately from the main body of the army, with just fourteen of his soldiers, including Bahram's brother Kurdi, Bind-uyah, Bištām, Sabūr, son of Afriyān, Abādh, son of Farrukhzād, and Farrukh Hurμuz,735 in a fierce hand-to-hand fight. The Zoroastrians (al-Majūs) asserts that Abarwīz got trapped in a defile and Bahram pursued him thither, but when Bahram was sure that he had Abarwīz in his power, something that could not be com-prehended (i.e., some supernatural power) took the latter up to the Hazārmārdān," hażārmārd "[having the strength of] a thousand men," being a frequent sobriquet of valiant warriors, as Nöldeke, trans. 284 n. 2, points out.

732. Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 88–89, discussed the readings for this unidentified name, which include Firdawsī's Dūk, and he thought that MP d.w.k might lie behind it. He also noted the frequent confusion in Arabic orthography of final kaf and lām and the existence of a place name Dūl to the southeast of Lake Urmiya. For the probable location of the final battle between Bahram and the combined forces of the Byzantine army and Khusraw, see n. 736 below,

733. Reading thus for the text's Mūsil, since Nöldeke, trans. 285 n. 3, identified him as Mushel, the Armenian ruler of Mūsh in eastern Anatolia, from the famous Mamikonian family.

734. Following the reading wa-ingadda in Addenda et emendanda, p. Dxciv.

735. Following the reconstruction of these names—all fourteen of them being given in Firdawsī's Shāh-nāma—in Addenda et emendanda, p. Dxciv, two of them, Sābūr, son of Afriyān, and Abādh, son of Farrukhzād, being to a considerable extent differently rendered in Nöldeke's original edition and his translation, 286, rendering some of the etymological speculations in his n. 2 invalid.
top of the mountain. It is mentioned that the astrologers agreed that Abarwiz would reign for forty-eight years. Abarwiz went out to engage Bahrām in single combat. He wrested Bahrām's spear from his hand and battered his head with it until the spear broke. Bahrām became downhearted about his cause; he grew fearful, and realized that he had no hope of withstanding Abarwiz. Hence he retreated toward Khurāsān and thence to the Turks.\footnote{736}

Abarwiz, meanwhile, journeyed to al-Madā'in after he had distributed twenty million [dirhams] among the Byzantine troops and had sent them back to Mawriq. It is said that Abarwiz wrote a letter to the Christians giving them permission to establish their churches ('imārat biya'īhim) and allowing anyone who wished, with the exception of the Zoroastrians, to adopt their faith.\footnote{737} In \footnote{736. Bahrām's troops in the vicinity of Niṣibin had at the beginning of 591 gone over to Khusrav's side on hearing of the latter's alliance with the Byzantines, so that Khusrav then controlled Upper Mesopotamia. The combined forces of Narses and Khusrav's general Mābōdī captured Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Weh Andiyōg Shābūr in summer 591, and Bahrām then faced the combined threat of Narses' army plus a mixed Persian-Armenian-Byzantine force under Bindūyah and the Greek general John Mysticus, moving southward from Armenia into Upper Mesopotamia. In Azerbaijan, on a plain to the east of Lake Urmīya, by a river called by the Byzantine historians Balārath, near the fortified point of Ganzakos [identified by Minorsky with the course of the Mūri Chay to the south of modern Marāghah], the armies met. Although Bahrām's army included a contingent of "Turks" plus a troop of war elephants, it was decisively defeated, with the victors seizing Bahrām's royal tent, harem, children, and jewels. He himself managed to escape with a small force of some four thousand men to Nishapur and thence across the Oxus to the "land of the Turks." See Higgins, \textit{The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (582–602),} Part I, 51–54; Minorsky, "The Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 87–91; Goubert, \textit{Byzance avant l'Islam,} I, 147–62; Elr, s.v. Bahrām. vii. Bahrām [VI] Cōbin (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

\footnote{737. As Noldeke noted, trans. 288 n. 1, Zoroastrian church law—like the subsequent Islamic one—prescribed death as the penalty for apostasy from that faith. The Greek and Syriac sources record that Khusrav Anūsharwān had executed high-born Persian converts to Christianity and had put to death the Monophysite Catholicos because he had baptised members of the imperial family; in the Perso-Byzantine treaty of 562 [see n. 703 above], this penalty for proselytism had been prescribed as the reflex of freedom of worship for the Christians. On Khusrav Abarwēz's policy toward the Christians, see Labourt, \textit{Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse,} 208–35; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 946. Labourt highlights the great influence at Khusrav's court of his treasurer, the Nestorian Yazdīn, descendant of the martyr Pethion [see n. 487 above] and the official responsible for collecting the land tax. Yazdīn was a member of a rich and influential Nestorian family from the vicinity of Dastagird in eastern Iraq [see on this place, n. 756 below]; a this connection he adduced the fact that Anūshahrwān had made a peace agreement with (kāna hādana) Qaysar regarding the tribute that he exacted from the Byzantine ruler, and had stipulated that those of his [Zoroastrian] compatriots who were in the Byzantine ruler’s lands should be kindly treated and that the monarch should build fire temples for them in his lands. Qaysar, for his part, had made a similar stipulation in regard to the Christians [in the Persian lands].

Bahram remained among the Turks, highly honored by the king, until Abarwiz intrigued against him by sending a man called Hurmuz. He sent him to the Turks with valuable jewels and other things, and Hurmuz was able to worm his way into the confidence Yezdinābdā described in Adiabene may reflect their property interests. This family was for long prominent in the financial administration of the Persian realm, and various of its members were generous benefactors of the Nestorian Church. Nevertheless, the see of Seleucia-Ctesiphon remained vacant from the Catholicos Gregory’s death in 609 till the end of Khusraw’s reign in 628, and Yazdin was unable to secure authorisation for his replacement (op. cit., 230-31).

The peace treaty of autumn 591, which concluded the Byzantine intervention in Persia, involved honors and presents for the Byzantine commanders and for the Armenian allies of Khusraw, with the Prince Stiubat Bagratuni being appointed Marzbān of Hyrcania/Gurgān. Khusraw now renounced his claims to some two-thirds of Armenia. Maurice recovered the town of Martyropolis, captured by the Persians in 588, and Daras/Darā was returned to him, although there was no question of the wide range of territory promised to Maurice by Bahram being relinquished, and Nišibin remained firmly in Persian hands. The financial provisions were important, but the twenty million dirhams mentioned by al-Tabari here were in practice a lesser sum, since they had to be set against the arrears of tribute due from the Byzantines in previous years. In the sphere of protocol, the Persian emperor now for the first time agreed to address the Byzantine monarch as Basileus in official correspondence instead of just Caesar [although it was to be Heraclius in 639, after his crushing victory over the Sāsānids, who was formally to adopt the title Basileus, previously used informally; see I. Shahid, “The Iranian Factor in Byzantium during the Reign of Heraclius,” 295–96]. According to Theophylactus, Maurice agreed to leave behind at Ctesiphon a force of one thousand Byzantine troops as Khusraw’s personal guard. See Nöldeke, trans. 287 n. 1; Bury, History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 112; Goubert, Byzance avant l’Islam, I, 163–70; Elt, s.v. Byzantine-Iranian Relations. I. Before the Islamic Conquest (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

This man appears in, e.g., al-Dinawārī, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 80, 83, and al-Ya’qūbī, Ta’rīkh, I, 193–94, with the further component to his name of Jarābzin (with Jalābzin also found in the sources, including al-Tabari, I, 1030, p. 360–61 and n. 864 below), the Zalabzan of Byzantine Greek historians. See Nöldeke, trans. 289 n. 1.
of Khätün, the king's wife, and win her over with those jewels and other things, until she engaged agents who secretly brought about Bahrm's death. It is said that Khâqân grieved over his killing, and sent a message to Kurdiyah, Bahrm's sister and wife, informing her of the fate that had come upon Bahrm through his respon-

740. The story of Bahrm's murder through feminine wiles is narrated in considerable detail by al-Dinawari, al-Akhbâr al-ţiwâl, 98–100, also in al-Ya'qûbî, Ta'rikh, I, 193–94, at fair length, laconically in al-Masûdî, Murûj, II, 222–23 = §§ 642–43, and Ţabari-Bal'amî, trans. II, 302–303. Bahrm's troops are said to have feared for their continued safety among the "Turks" after their commander's death and to have returned to the security of the fastnesses of Daylam in the Elburz mountains, where Sasanid control was negligible, taking part later in the revolt of Bistam.

At-Ţabari records nothing of the fates of Khusraw Abarwèz's two great-uncles Binduyah and Bistam [on whom see n. 711 above]. Al-Dinawari, op. cit., 101–105, and al-Ya'qûbî, op. cit., I, 194–95, deal with them at length and in the same romantic guise as the legends around Bahrm Chûbin's end, concluding with Bistam's revolt and eventual death through the craftiness of Kurdiyah, Bahrm's sister. Certain Greek and Armenian sources have more prosaic but much briefer references. Theophylactus states that Khusraw took vengeance on all those who had been involved in the deposition and blinding of his father Hormizd, and had Binduyah thrown into the Tigris; the Armenian historian Sebeos says that Bistam fled to "Parthia" and was later treacherously killed by a "Kushan" ruler of the east. The Anonymus Guidi, tr. 8–9, also records their deaths. There was thus in Nûldeke's time little hard historical fact on the revolt, but in his trans. 478–87, Excursus 7, he extracted what he could out of the meager evidence. He concluded that Khusraw probably dealt with Binduyah fairly quickly, but that Bistam, who had been appointed Marzbân of Khurásân, did not rebel until 591 or early 592, and that he maintained himself virtually independent in northern Persia till the end of 595, since coins of his are extant, dated to what are called years 2–6 of his reign. We now know considerably more, above all through the information given by al-Dinawari [known to Nûldeke but still in manuscript and apparently not fully accessible to him] and from fresh numismatic evidence. It seems accordingly that Bistam held power ca. 590–96 over a considerable stretch of territory in the north, from Media/jibál and the Caspian provinces to Khurásân as far as the Oxus, with the backing of many local magnates and troops from Bahrm Chûbin's former army. He minted coins at Rayy, under the name PYLWCY WSTHM, i.e., Përöz Vistahm, with dates extending over seven regnal years. See on his coins Paruck, Sâsânian Coins, 67, 386, Plate XX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 53, Table XI, Plate 13; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 150–51; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 237. The coin sequence, and information in Christian sources, indicate that it was not till 596 that Khusraw Abarwèz managed through intrigue to procure Bistam's death and thus end his separatist movement; he also slew some sixty members of the families of Binduyah and Bistam. These killings were to form one of the accusations laid at Khusraw's door when he himself was deposed and executed over thirty years later, see al-Ţabari, I, pp. 1046–47, 1051–52, 1053–54, pp. 382–84, 387–88, 390–91 below. See Efr, s.v. Bistam o Bendöy [A. Sh. Shahbazi].
sibility and asking if he could marry her to his brother N.ṭrā (?). For this reason (i.e., his responsibility for the killing of Bahram) he divorced Khāṭūn. It is said that Kurdiyah gave Khāqān a soft answer but refused N.ṭrā. She gathered round herself the warriors who had been with her brother, and set off with them from the land of the Turks toward the borders of the kingdom of Persia. N.ṭrā the Turk pursued her with twelve thousand warriors, but she killed him with her own hand. She proceeded onward and wrote to her brother Kurdi, who subsequently secured for her from Abarwiz a grant of safe conduct and security (amān). When she reached Abarwiz, he married her. He was highly taken with her, and thanked her for having (previously) reproached Bahram.741 Abarwiz showed himself grateful and acted in a kindly way toward Mawriq.742

After Kīsrā had reigned for fourteen years, the Byzantines deposed Mawriq and killed him, also exterminating all his heirs, apart from one of his sons who fled to Kīsrā, and they raised to the throne as their king a man named Fūqā (Phocas).743 When Kīsrā heard the news of the Byzantines' breaking their allegiance to Mawriq and their killing him, he became violently aroused, regarded it with revulsion, and was gripped by anger.744 He gave

741. There does not seem to be any firm historical information that Khusraw did marry Kurdiya, though it would not be unexpected. The story involving N.ṭrā, a name which does not look possible as a Turkish one, must be pure legend.
742. See n. 738 above.
743. Text, Qufa.
744. The killing of Maurice was, nevertheless, only a pretext for the beginning of hostilities, since there had been tension with Persia already in the latter years of asylum to Mawriq's son, who had come to him as a refugee, crowned him, and set him up as king of the Byzantines, then sent him back with a mighty army headed by three of his commanders. The first one was called Rumiyūzān [?]. Köra sent him to Syria, which he then subdued and penetrated as far as Palestine. Köra came to the city of Jerusalem (Bayt al-Magdis) and took action against its bishop and all the priests in the city and the rest of the Christians over the Cross [of Jesus], which had been placed in a chest of gold and buried, with a vegetable garden planted on top of it. He pressed them hard until they showed him the spot. He then dug it out with his own hand and sent it to Köra in the twenty-fourth year of his reign. The second commander was called Shāhin and was the Fadhusban of the West. He proceeded onward until he captured Egypt and Alexandria and the land of Nubia, and sent back to Köra the keys of the city of Alexandria in the twenty-

---

745. Identified by Noldeke, trans. 290 n. 3, with the Romizān of Michael the Syrian and Barhebraeus and the Rhoussiazān of Theophanes. Noldeke also thought it possible that Barhebraeus was correct in identifying him with the other Persian commander Shahrbarāz mentioned a few lines further on (see on the meaning of this name, n. 749 below), with Shahrbarāz being another component of Romizān's name (but in that place, we have Shahrbarāz equated with Farru[č]bān). It was Shahrbarāz who was actually the Persian commander who conquered Jerusalem in 614, hence this would fit with what al-Ṭabarī goes on to say of Rumiyūzān's conquests in Syria and Palestine.

746. After appearing in Syria, the Persian army had occupied Damascus in 613 and had appeared in Palestine in spring 614 after defeating the Byzantine forces in the Ḫawrān between al-Darā'ah and Boṣrā [possibly the battle referred to in Sūrat al-Rūm, Qur'ān, XXX, 2–3, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1005, 1007, pp. 324, 327 and n. 761 below]. See R. Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule. A Historical and Archaeological Study, 20ff.

747. The capture of Jerusalem probably took place in June 614, when the city suffered a three days' sacking at the hands of the Šasanid troops. The "bishop" was the Patriarch Zacharias, installed at Jerusalem by Phocas's general Bonosus in 609 but now carried off into captivity in Persia; he remained titular Patriarch until his death in exile around the time of the Byzantines' final defeat of the Persian, i.e., ca. 627–28, with Modestus acting as his locum tenens in the years of the Persian occupation of Palestine and Syria. The True Cross was certainly carried off by the victors, not to be restored until 629, but the Sponge and the Spear were preserved and taken to Constantinople. See Noldeke, trans. 391 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 314; 39, 46; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule, 33–39, 46.
The third commander was called Farruhān (i.e., Farrukhān), who had the rank of Shahrbarāz. He led an expedition to attack Constantinople, until he halted on the bank of the strait (i.e., the Bosphorus) just near the city, and made his encampment there. Kisrā ordered him to devastate the land of the Byzantines, as an expression of his anger at the Byzantines' violence against Mawriq and as an act of vengeance upon them for him. But none of the Byzantines acknowledged Mawriq's son as their ruler or offered him any obedience. However, they killed Fūqā, the king whom they had raised to the throne as ruler over them, when his evil doing, his impiety toward God, and his reprehensible behavior became apparent to them. They raised to royal power over themselves a man called Hiraql (Heraclius).
When Hiraql perceived the perilous state the land of the Byzantines was in, with the Persian armies devastating it, their killing of the Byzantine warriors, their carrying off into captivity of the Byzantines' women and children, their plundering of the Byzantines' wealth, and their violation of the inmost parts of their realm, he shed tears before God and made humble petition to Him, imploring Him to rescue him and the people of his kingdom from the Persian armies. He saw in a dream a stout-bodied man, on a lofty throne and accoutred with fine weapons (i.e., the Persian king), set up some distance from his side. Another person came into their presence, threw down that man from his throne, and said to Hiraql, "I have delivered him into your hands." When Hiraql woke up, he told no one about his dream. The next night, Hiraql saw in a dream the man whom he had seen in his previous dream seated on a lofty throne, and the man who had come in upon the two of them now came to him with a long chain in his hand, which he threw round the neck of the man on the throne and held him in his power with it, saying to Hiraql, "Here, I've done it; I have handed Kisra over to you completely. So march against him now, for victory will be yours, you will be given power over him and you will attain your desire in your campaign." When these dreams came to him successively, he at last recounted them to the great men of the Byzantines and to those of them with

---

751. The Persian invasion of Anatolia had left the Persian army stationed at Chalcedon on the eastern shore of the Bosphorus, permanently threatening the Byzantine capital. Syria and Palestine were under Persian occupation, and the Christians there suffered massacres and the loss of many religious buildings; the interlude between Heraclius's regaining these provinces and the appearance of the Muslim Arabs in the mid-630s was too brief to enable the Christian communities there to recover their lost position. The Copts and Greeks in Egypt likewise endured massacres and saw the destruction of many churches and monasteries; the Persian forces spread up the Nile valley as far as Syene/Aswan and westward along the Mediterranean coast to the Pentapolis (i.e., the modern Cyrenaica). Phocas's disastrous reign had witnessed the collapse of what remained of the Byzantine limes on the Sava and lower Danube, allowing the Avars (who had moved westward from Inner Asia before the expanding power of the first Türk empire there) and Slavs to overrun the Balkans and Greece, with the Avars reaching the suburbs of the capital itself in 617. The situation appeared so desperate that in 618 Heraclius contemplated abandoning Constantinople for Carthage, but was deterred by the Patriarch Sergius. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 214–18; Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt, 54–92; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine, 20–48.
penetrating judgment. They told him that he would be given power over Kisrâ, and advised him to lead an expedition against him.

Hiraql prepared for the campaign, and appointed one of his sons as his deputy over the city of Constantinople.\textsuperscript{752} He took a different route from that of Shahrbarâz and proceeded onward until he penetrated deeply into Armenia and encamped at Nisibin after the space of a year.\textsuperscript{753} Shâhîn, the Fâdhûsbân of the West, \textsuperscript{752} On his accession to power, Heraclius had found the empire in desperate straits. He had to quell the revolt in 610–11 at Ancyra of Phocas's brother Comentiolus, which caused a delay to his plans for rebuilding the Byzantine war machine, and he had to force the untrustworthy general of the army in Cappadocia, Priscus, a brother-in-law of Phocas, to relinquish his command and enter a monastery. Heraclius now endeavored to secure his position in the Balkans by making peace with the Khan of the Avars in 620, agreeing to pay him tribute (even if this relief from Avar attacks was only short-lived). He inaugurated extensive reforms and reorganization in both provincial and central administration. Details are sparse, but it seems that, once the Persians had been pushed out of Anatolia in 623 (see n. 753 below), Heraclius began the extensive settlement there of picked troops, \textit{epilektai}, possibly the genesis of the military theme system which was to develop in the later seventh century as a response to Arab attacks along the Taurus mountains frontier. Naval forces were also built up; the Byzantine fleet was used to transport an army in spring 622 to Lazica so that it could campaign successfully in Armenia, and skillful use of sea power prevented any effective link-up of the Persians with their putative allies in the Balkans, the Avars, Slavs, and Bulgars.

The emperor's campaign of revenge was to take on something of the character of a holy war; Byzantine religious feeling had been profoundly shocked by the Persians' carrying off from Jerusalem the True Cross, and the church contributed extensively of its gold and silver for the financing of Heraclius's efforts. Moreover, once Heraclius had achieved his victory, former Byzantine territory recovered, Greek captives returned from Persia and the True Cross restored to Jerusalem, he was to assume formally the title (hitherto used in an informal fashion only) of \textit{basileus}, "emperor," with connotations of divine approval of the royal power; Irfan Shahid has suggested that, in the assumption of this imperial title, Heraclius was influenced by the example of Christian monarchy in Armenia and was also harking back to the Davidic monarchy over Israel. See Bury, \textit{A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene}, II, 244–45; Shahid, "The Iranian Factor in Byzantium during the Reign of Heraclius," 295–320.

\textsuperscript{753} Heraclius's initial campaign, the first of his six campaigns against the Persians, was aimed at Shahrbarâz, who was still encamped at Chalcedon. It start-was at Kīsrā's court when Hirāql reached Niṣībīn, because Kīsrā had become angry with him and had dismissed him from that frontier command (ṭhaghṛ). Shāḥbārāz, however, was firmly holding the place where he was stationed because of Kīsrā's command to him to remain there and not leave it.754 Kīsrā received the news of Hirāql's descent on Niṣībīn with his army, and sent to combat Hirāql one of his commanders called Rāhzād755 with twelve thousand warriors, giving him orders to remain at Ninnīwā [Nineveh] in the vicinity of the town of al-Mawṣil [Mosul], on the banks of the Tigris, and to prevent the Byzantines from crossing the river. Kīsrā had been residing at Daskar at al-Malīk756 when the news about Hirāql reached him.

Rāhzād put Kīsrā's command into effect and encamped in the place he had instructed. Hirāql, however, crossed the Tigris at a different spot and marched toward the district where the Persian army lay. Rāhzād sent out spies against Hirāql; they came back... and told him that Hiraql had ninety thousand warriors. Râhzâdh was now convinced that he and the troops at his disposal were inadequate for withstanding such a number of troops. He wrote several times to Kisrâ that Hiraql was pressing heavily on him with forces so numerous and so well equipped that he and his troops could not withstand them. To all that, Kisrâ kept on replying that, if he was too weak to withstand those Byzantines, he would not be too weak to get his troops to fight to the last and to lavish their blood in his service. When Râhzâdh had secured the same reply successively for his letter to Kisrâ, he got his troops ready for action and attacked the Byzantines. The latter killed Râhzâdh and six thousand of his men. The rest were routed and fled precipitately. The news of the Byzantines' killing of Râhzâdh and the victory gained by Hiraql reached Kisrâ. This catastrophe crushed his spirits, and he left Daskarat al-Malik for al-Mada'in and fortified himself within it because he was too weak to stand up to Hiraql in battle. Hiraql advanced until he was near to al-Mada'in. But when ever-fresh reports about him kept reaching Kisrâ, and he prepared to fight Hiraql, the latter turned back to the Byzantine lands.

Kisrâ wrote to the three army commanders who had been defeated, instructing them to send him information about every one of their troops who had shown weakness in that battle or who had not stuck fast to their posts. They were to punish these men according to their degrees of guilt. Through this letter, he provoked them into rebelliousness against him and into seeking ways to preserve themselves safe from him. He also wrote to Shahrbarâz, ordering him to come to him as rapidly as possible and to describe for him what the Byzantines had done in his province.

---

757. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 296 n. 1, Khusraw's flight from Daskarah/Dastgird was a great blow to his authority, and contributed to the loss of confidence in him which was to lead to his deposition and death. It had been his seat of government almost continuously since 604 because of a prediction that he would die at Ctesiphon. See Christensen, Sassanides, 454.

759. It was this letter that was reportedly intercepted by the Greeks, enabling them to spread disinformation which ensured that Shahrbarâz did not march eastward to shore up the Persian defenses in Iraq, see n. 754 above. The doubts and
It has been said that God's words, "Alif, lām, mīm. The Romans have been defeated in the nearer part of the land," but after their defeat they will be victorious within a few years. The affair belongs to God, before and after, and on that day the believers will rejoice in God's succor; He succors whom He pleases, and He is the Mighty, the Compassionate One. The promise of God! God does not fall short in His promise, but most of the people do not know.

Mention of Those Who Say That

There related to me al-Qāsim b. al-Hasan—al-Ḥusayn—Hājjāj—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh—'Ikrimah, who said: The Byzantines and the Persians fought together in the nearer part of the land. He related: The nearer part of the land [refers to] the Day of...
Adhri'at, where the two armies met, and the Byzantines were defeated.\textsuperscript{763} This came to the ears of the Prophet and his companions while they were [still] in Mecca (i.e., before the Hijrah) and caused them distress. The Prophet disliked the Zoroastrian gentiles (\textit{al-ummiyyûn min al-Majûs}) gaining the upper hand over the Byzantine possessors of written scriptures (\textit{ahl al-kitâb min al-Rûm}). The unbelievers in Mecca, however, rejoiced and hurled abuse; they encountered the Prophet's companions and said, "You are possessors of a written scripture, and the Christians are possessors of a written scripture, while we are unbelievers. Now our brethren, the Persians, have been victorious over your brethren, the possessors of written scriptures, and if you attack us, we shall certainly be victorious over you."\textsuperscript{764} At this point, God sent down the revelation "\textit{Alif, lâm, mîm. The Romans have been defeated . . .}" to "they are unheeding about the next life."

\textsuperscript{763} Adhri'at, in Biblical times the capital of Bashan, the Edrei of Num. xxii. 33, is the more recent al-Dara'ah or Deras just north of the Syrian-Jordanian frontier at the southern edge of the Hawrân. See Yâqût, Buldân, I, 130–31; Le Strange, Palestine, 383; A.-S. Marmardji, \textit{Textes géographiques arabes sur la Palestine}, 3; \textit{BP}, s.v. Adhri'at [F. Buhl-N. Elisséeff]; and n. 746 above. The Cairo text, II, 184, has "the nearest part of the land was, at that time (\textit{yawma'idhin}, for the Leiden text's \textit{yawm}) Adhri'at," with this reading taken from al-Tabari, \textit{Tafsîr on Sûrah XXX}.

\textsuperscript{764} Kister has pointed out that the Persians may have tried in the sixth century to exercise some form of indirect control or influence over Hijâz, including over Mecca and Medina. The seventh/thirteenth-century, hence comparatively late, author Ibn Sa'id mentions that, in the time of Qubadh, son of Fayruz, Qubadh attempted, through the agency of the Kindi chief al-Hârith b. 'Amr (on whom see n. 363 above), to impose the doctrine of Mazdak that he had espoused, and some people in Mecca assented to this summons (\textit{tazandaqa}). Muhammad b. Habib actually lists the alleged \textit{zanādiqah} (whoever these may be, however, see below) of Quraysh (\textit{Muhabbar}, 161). Hence the Meccan pagans might well have retained memories of the connection with Persia, enough to use this as a way of slighting Muhammad when, at this stage in his mission, he would have had a natural sympathy toward the Christian Byzantines as fellow monotheists. See Kister, "Al-Hira. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia," 144–45. On the other hand, earlier Arabic authors, such as Muhammed b. Habib, in his \textit{Muhabbar}, loc. cit., and Ibn Qutaybah, in his \textit{Ma'arif}, 631, state that Quraysh got their \textit{zandaqa} from al-Hirah. De Blois has accordingly suggested that, in early Islamic usage, \textit{zandaqa} normally means "Manichaeism" and that Manichaeism was conveyed to Mecca by Qurashi traders who derived it from converts to Manichaeism from among the Christian population of al-Hirah, i.e., from elements of the Ibâd; Ibn Sa'id's story would have arisen from a confusion and conflation of information in the earlier sources. See de Blois, "The 'Sabians' [Şâbi'ûn] in Pre-Islamic Arabia," 48–50 and n. 38. See also Nöldeke, trans. 298 n. 1.
Abū Bakr al-Siddiq went forth to the unbelievers (al-kuṭṭāf) and said, “Have you rejoiced at the victory of your brethren over our brethren? Don’t rejoice! May God not give you refreshing solace! By God, the Byzantines will be victorious over the Persians; our Prophet has told us that.” Ubayy b. Khalaf al-Jumahi came up to him and said, “You lie, O Abū Fuḍayl!” Abū Bakr answered him, “You are a bigger liar, O enemy of God!” He added, “I wager you ten of my young she-camels against ten of yours. If within the next three years the Byzantines are victorious over the Persians, I get the stake; and if the Persians are victorious, you get it.” Then Abū Bakr went to the Prophet and told him this. The Prophet said, “I didn’t express myself thus: ‘a few’ (al-bid’a) means a number from three to nine, so raise the stake and extend the period of time with him.” Abū Bakr accordingly went out and met Ubayy, and the latter commented, “Perhaps you have come to regret [your wager]?” He replied, “Not at all. Come on, I’ll raise the stake with you and extend the period of time: make it a hundred young she-camels over a period up to nine years.” Ubayy answered, “I agree.”

There related to us al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Bakr—‘Ikrimah, who said: There was in Persia a woman who gave birth only to kings and heroes. Kisrā summoned her and said, “I am planning to send an army against the Byzantines and to appoint one of your sons as its commander. Advise me, which of them should I nominate?” She replied, “The first one is so-and-so, who is craftier than a fox and more wary than a falcon; then there is Farrukhān, who is more incisive than a spear point; and then there is Shahrbardz, who is more sagacious (ahlam) than such-and-such. So appoint whichever of them you please.” He said, “I appoint the sagacious one,” and he appointed Shahrbardz. He pro-

765. Ubayy was a member of the clan of Jumah, which ranged itself with the Makhzūm—‘Abd Shams group within Mecca, largely hostile to Muḥammad; he fought in the army of Quraysh at the battle of Uhud, and died of wounds received there. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1407, 1409. “Abū Fuḍayl” was a kunyah or patronymic of Abū Bakr’s, here used as a familiar form of address. The Cairo text, II, 184, has for this kunyah “Abū Faṣīl.”

766. The same story in al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XX, 13.

767. As suggested in nn. 745, 749 above, the two components of Shahrbardz Farrukhān’s name—if this is indeed one person—have apparently been wrongly separated here and made into two different persons.
ceeded to [the land of] the Byzantines with the Persian army, defeated the Byzantines, slaughtered them, devastated their towns, and cut down their olive trees.

Abū Bakr says:768 I related this narrative to ‘Aṯā’ al-Khurāsānī,769 and he asked me, “Have you ever seen the land of Syria?” I said, “No,” and he replied, “If you had ever been there you would have seen the towns that were laid waste and the olive trees that were cut down.”770 Later, I actually went to Syria and saw this.” ‘Aṯā’ al-Khurāsānī related from Yahyā b. Ya‘mar, who said: Qaysar sent a man called Q.t.mah (?)771 with a Byzantine army, and Kisra sent Shahrbarāz. The two met up with each other at Adhri‘at and Buṣrā, which are the nearest parts of Syria to you (i.e., the Arabs). The Persians encountered the Byzantines and defeated them. The unbelievers of Quraysh in Mecca rejoiced at this; whereas, the Meccans were chagrined. God then sent down the revelation “Alif, lām, mīm. The Romans have been defeated . . . ” to the end of the section. Then he mentions further another narrative, like ‘Ikrimah’s but with additional details. Shahrbarāz kept on relentlessly defeating them and laying waste their towns until he reached the Bosphorus (al-khalij). But then, Kisra died. News of this reached them, and Shahrbarāz and his followers retreated precipitately. Fortune swung round to give the Byzantines power over the Persians at that point, and they pursued and killed them.

He related: ‘Ikrimah said in his narrative: When the Persians were victorious over the Byzantines, Farrukhan was once sitting and drinking, and said to his companions, “I had a dream, and it

770. That is, he saw, after the lapse of more than a century, the effects of devastation, in 613–14, by the invading Persian army. See Nöldeke, trans. 390 n. 4.
771. This name is obscure. Nöldeke, trans. 300 n. 1, adduced as a possibility the Jafnid/Gassānid al-Nu‘mān b. al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah, to whom Ḥamzah al-‘Iṣfahānī, Ta‘rikh, 103, gives the cognomen (laqab) Q.tām, but later, in his Die Chassānischen Fürsten, 44, Nöldeke took this as a confusion with the name of the chief of Kindah, Ǧu‘rī b. Ǧumma Qaṭām mentioned in the Mu‘allaqah of al-Ḥārith b. Ḥillizah, it being in any case difficult to take the name Qaṭām as anything but a female one.
was as if I saw myself on Kisra's throne. This came to Kisra's ears, and he wrote to Shahrbaraz, "When this letter of mine reaches you, send to me Farrukhan's head." Shahrbaraz wrote back to him, however, "O king, you will never find anyone like Farrukhan who has inflicted so much damage on the enemy or has such a formidable reputation among them; so don't do this!" Kisra answered him, "Among the men of Persia there is certainly someone who can serve as his replacement, so hasten and send me his head!" Shahrbaraz made further representations to him, which angered Kisra, and he made no further answer but sent a courier of the postal and intelligence service (barid) to the people of Persia announcing, "I hereby remove Shahrbaraz from power over you and appoint Farrukhan over you in his stead." Then he handed over to the courier a small sheet and instructed him, "When Farrukhan assumes royal authority and his brother gives him obedience, then give him this." When Shahrbaraz read the letter, he said, "I hear and obey!" He got down from his throne. Farrukhan sat down [in his place], and he handed over the paper. Farrukhan then said, "Bring Shahrbaraz before me," and pushed him forward so that his head could be cut off. Shahrbaraz, however, protested, "Don't be in such a hurry, let me write my last testament!" and Farrukhan agreed to this. Shahrbaraz called for a chest and gave him three sheets [of paper from out of it], telling him, "I sent these sheets to Kisra pleading for you, and now you want to execute me on the pretext of a single letter." At this, Farrukhan gave the royal authority back to his brother.

772. The dream predicts Shahrbaraz Farrukhan's later elevation to his forty days' reign in Ctesiphon, see al-Tabari, I, 1062-63, p. 401-403.
773. See on this institution n. 147 above.
774. As emerges a few lines below, the sheet contains an order for Shahrbaraz's execution. The motif of a letter containing a command to kill the unsuspecting bearer is an ancient one, and in Arabic lore is exemplified by the "letter of al-Mutalammis," given to the pre-Islamic poet al-Mutalammis by the Lakhmid `Amr b. Hind [see on him n. 414 above] but which he was sharp enough to destroy, whereas his nephew, the poet Tārafah, duly delivered his letter and thereby brought about his own death. See EI2, s.v. al-Mutalammis (Ch. Pellat). Cf. also the parallel use, in different circumstances, of a letter containing orders for an execution, that of Oroetes of Sardis at the behest of King Darius, in Herodotus, III.128.
775. The above story continues the separation of Shahrbaraz-Farrukhan into Shahrbarāz wrote to Qaysar, the king of the Byzantines, "I have a request to make to you which couriers cannot carry and no documents can convey. Come and meet me, but with just fifty Byzantine troops, and I will bring just fifty Persian ones." Qaysar, however, came with five hundred thousand Byzantine troops and began to place spies along the road before him, fearing that Shahrbarāz might be contemplating some act of trickery with him, until his spies returned to him with the information that Shahrbarāz had with him only fifty men. A carpet was spread out for them both, and they met in a brocade tent that had been erected for them. Each of them had a knife by his side. They summoned an interpreter for their negotiations, and Shahrbarāz said, "The ones who laid waste your towns were my brother and my-two different persons, as set forth in nn. 745, 749, 767 above. The second commander involved in the story is presumably in reality the Shāhīn mentioned by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1003, p. 321 above. For the apparently more historical episode of the letter of dismissal and death which Khusraw despatched to Shahrbarāz's second-in-command at the Persian camp in Chalcedon and which was intercepted by the Byzantines and its contents revealed to Shahrbarāz, see Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 244. The story became a romantic tale handed down among the Persians, and is listed as such by Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 364 (read Shahrbarāz for Shahrīzād), tr. II, 716.

The whole story of Shahrbarāz's defection from Khusraw's cause to the side of the Byzantines has recently been discussed, on a basis of the sources available, by Walter E. Kaegi and Paul M. Cobb. They distinguish the Eastern Christian ones from the early Islamic ones. Very similar, though with some variation of details, are the accounts of Theophanes, Michael the Syrian, and Agapius of Mambij; these would seem to go back to the lost Syriac historian Theophilus of Edessa, and in them, Shahrbarāz's defection is attributed to Khusraw's suspicious nature thereby driving his commander into Heraclius's arms. The account in the Short History of Nicephorus, however, simply makes Heraclius's triumph against the Persians the result of his excellent strategy and generalship, with no suggestion of internal stresses and suspicions within the Persian camp. At the side of these Christian accounts are the Islamic ones: the one given on the basis of reports from 'Ikrimah given here by al-Ṭabarī, and the much less-noticed one—because concealed within a history that ostensibly deals only with the conquest of Egypt—going back to the traditionist of the Umayyad period al-Zuhri (see on him n. 789 below) and preserved within the Futūḥ Misr of Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam (said to have d. 171/787-88). Both Islamic accounts share similarities with the Christian accounts, and could represent a single, original tradition, although al-Zuhri has the interesting additional feature of a plausible reason for Khusraw's anger with Shahrbarāz, i.e., the latter's procrastination, his failure to launch a decisive assault on Constantinople and thus destroy the Byzantine empire. See Kaegi and Cobb, "Heraclius, Shahrbarāz, and al-Ṭabarī," 121-43.
self, with our stratagems and our valor. But now Kisrā has come to envy us and wants me to kill my brother. When I refused to do this, he ordered my brother to kill me. Hence both of us have thrown off allegiance to him, and are ready to fight at your side against him." Qaysār said, "You have made the right choice."

Then one of the two made a sign to his companion, [saying,] "The secret lies between two people; if it goes beyond two people, it will become public knowledge." The other said, "Yes, indeed." So they both fell upon the interpreter and killed him with their knives.776 God brought about Kisrā's death, and the news of this reached the Messenger of God on the Day of Hudaybiyah, causing him and his companions to rejoice.777

I received information going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said that in the twentieth year of Kisrā Abarwiz's reign, God sent Muḥammad [as His prophet].778 The latter remained thirteen years in Mecca, and he emigrated to Medina in the thirty-third year of Kisrā's reign.

776. According to Nöldke, trans. 302 n. 1, these negotiations in fact refer to a meeting of Heraclius and Shahrbarāz at the Anatolian town of Arabissos (in Armenia Tertia, what was later Little Armenia, somewhere in the region of the mediaeval town of Elbistan; see Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, 1/1, 610–11) in June 629 after Khusrav Abarwēz had been deposed and killed and after Shahrbarāz had led a rebellion at Ctesiphon against his rival for the direction of state affairs under the youthful new king Kawād II Shērōy, had killed the latter after a reign of only eighteen months, and proclaimed himself ruler, though not of Sāsānid or Arsacid royal stock [see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1061–63, p. 400–403 below, and cf. Christensen, Sassanides, 497–98; Frey, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 170–71; Kaegi and Cobb, "Heraclius, Shahrbarāz, and al-Ṭabarī," loc. cit., noting that an anonymous Syriac chronicle from 724 confirms the Arabic sources regarding the location of the meeting at Arabissos and records the construction of a church by Heraclius and Shahrbarāz, dedicated in the name of Eirēnē, "Peace," at their meeting point. Shahrbarāz's rapid rise to power and ephemeral rule—he was killed by a conspiracy at Ctesiphon led by rival military leaders and great men of state, who subsequently set up as nominal ruler there Khusrav's daughter Būrān (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1063–64, p. 403–405, below)—was aided by Heraclius's support, who had remained at Ganzak in Azerbaijan during the upheavals within the Persian state [see nn. 758–59].

777. The treaty of Hudaybiyah made between Muḥammad and the Meccans was concluded at that place on the edge of the Meccan Haram in Dhu al-Qa'dah 6/March 628, hence in the month after Khusrav's death. See al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XX, 13–14; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 286–90; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 46–52; EP, s.v. al-Hudaybiya [W. M. Watt].

778. That is, in A.D. 610.
Mention of the Account Concerning the Events That Happened When God Wished to Take Away from the People of Persia Rule over Persia, and the Arabs’ Overrunning it by Means of God’s Favoring Them with His Prophet Muḥammad, Involving the Prophethood, the Caliphate, the Royal Power, and the Dominion, in the Days of Kīsrā Abarwīz779

This includes what has been related from Wahb b. Munabbī, which is what was related to us by Ibn Ḫumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: This account of Kīsrā is what one of my colleagues related to me from Wahb b. Munabbī: That Kīsrā constructed a dam on the “Blind Tigris” (Dīlah al-ʿAwrā’)780 and expended on it sums of such magnitude that no one knew their extent. Also, the throne room of his palace (ṭāq majlisīhī) was built [with such splendor] as had never been seen before. He used to suspend his crown and sit on his throne when he was in public audience. He had 360 men who were prognosticators (ḥuzzāt),781 these being learned scholars (ʿulamā’), including soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers. He related: Among these was a man from the Arabs called al-Saʿīb who used to draw omens from the flight of birds in the manner of the Arabs and who was seldom wrong. Bādhān had sent him to Kīsrā from Yemen.782 Whenever Kīsrā was disturbed by some matter, he would order his

779. The following is an embellished account of the events leading up to Khushraw’s deposition and death, concentrating on the prognostications and portents that pointed to and presaged these events.

780. Al-‘awrā’ (fem.) means “the one-eyed.” As applied to the Tigris, it is the estuary, extending nearly one hundred miles, of the combined Euphrates and Tigris before it debouches into the Persian Gulf at Abādān, i.e., the modern Shaṭṭ al-ʿArab. The appellation “one-eyed” may stem from the fact either of the island of Ḫuways being close to the estuary’s mouth or of the existence of the sand bar there. See Le Strange, Lands, 26, 43; EP, s.v. Shaṭṭ al-ʿArab [Amatziya Baram]. According to al-Baladūrī, Futūḥ, 292, Khushraw had attempted, at the end of his reign, to cope with excessive floods in Lower Iraq by repairing or constructing dams with sluices (musannayāṭ) and diversion channels from the river to feed the canals [buthuq] (for these terms, see Bosworth, “Some Remarks on the Terminology of Irrigation Practices and Hydraulic Constructions,” 81–82), but without success.

781. The ḥāzī was essentially the kāhin or soothsayer in his rôle as prognosticator, the term being etymologically connected with the Biblical Hebrew ḥōzēh or seer. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 112–13.

782. Bādhān was the last Persian governor in Yemen. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 958, p. 252 and n. 609 above.
soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers to be gathered together and would tell them, “Look into this matter and see exactly what it is.”

Now when God sent His prophet Muhammad, Kisra woke up one morning and found that the arched roof of his royal palace (tāq mulkīhi) had collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it; also, that the [dam on the] “Blind Tigris” had been breached. When he saw all that, he became filled with grief and said, “The arched roof of my royal palace has collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it, and the [dam on the] ‘Blind Tigris’ has been breached: Shah bishikast,” meaning [in Arabic] “the king has been overthrown (literally, ‘broken’).” Then he summoned his soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers, and summoned al-Sa‘ib with them, too. He told them “The arched roof of my royal palace has collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it, and the [dam on the] ‘Blind Tigris’ has been breached: Shah bishikast. Look into this matter and see exactly what it is.”

They left his presence and looked into his affair, but all the quarters of the heavens became covered over for them and the earth became darkened; they exploited to the full the resources of their knowledge, but none of the magicians’ magic or the soothsayers’ ability to look into the future proved efficacious, nor was the astrologers’ knowledge of the stars of any avail. Al-Sa‘ib spent the whole of a dark, overcast night on a hillock, where he saw a lightning flash that arose from the direction of Hijāz, flew across the heavens, and reached as far as the East. The next morning, he looked at what was beneath his feet, and behold, there was a green meadow. He then made a pronouncement in his role as diviner: “If what I was seeing is true, there will arise from Hijāz a dominion (sultan) which will reach the East and from which the earth will grow green and fertile—much more so than from any previous kingdom.”

When the soothsayers and astrologers spoke together confidentially [about what they had seen] and saw what had happened to themselves, and perceived that only Sa‘ib had really seen anything, they said to each other, “You know, by

[783. Referring, of course, to the rise of Muḥammad and the birth of the new faith in Mecca.]
God, that it can only be something originated from the heavens that has prevented you from utilizing your specialist knowledge; that is because of a prophet who has been already sent [from God], or is just about to be sent, who will take away this present royal power and smash it. But if you announce to Kisra the impending destruction of his royal power, he will surely kill you, so concoct among yourselves some explanation you can give him that will deflect [his wrath] from you for some length of time.” So they went to Kisra and told him. “We have looked into this matter and have found that your astrological calculators, to whom you entrusted the prognostications for building the roof of your royal palace and likewise for the construction of the dam across the ‘Blind Tigris’, based their calculations on inauspicious stars. When night and day successively worked on those constructions, the inauspicious stars assumed their most maleficient positions, so that everything based upon those nights and days was destroyed. We can, however, make a calculation for you regarding when you should begin the work of reconstruction, and this will not be destroyed.” Kisra said, “Make the calculation, then.” They did this for him and told him, “Now construct it!” So he did that, and was at work on the Tigris for eight months, expending on it an incalculable amount of money. When it was at last completed, Kisra asked them, “Shall I sit down on top of the dam’s wall?” They replied, “Yes.” So he called for carpets and coverings and aromatic herbs to be placed on it. He ordered the marzbans to be gathered together before him, as were also musicians and players (la“ābūn). Then he went forth and sat down on it. But when once he was installed there, the Tigris dashed the construction away from beneath him, and he was only extricated [from it] at his last gasp. When they had got him out, he gathered together his soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers, executed nearly a hundred of them and said, “I let you grow fat and let you come closer to my presence than other people, and I gave you living allowances, and then you trifle with me!” They responded, “O king, we were at fault, just as those before us were at fault, but we can make a [new] calculation for you, and you can be sure of it, and you can accordingly begin the task of reconstruction on the most reliably auspicious of days!” Kisrā said, “Take care what you say!” They replied, “We will indeed!” Kisrā further said, “Make the calculation, then.” They did this for him and told him, “Now construct it!” He expended on it an incalculable amount of money, over a period of eight months from that point.

784. Belief in the favorable or unfavorable effects of the movements of the heavenly bodies went back to the Ancient Near Eastern civilizations and to the Greeks’ division of the planets into beneficent ones, agathopoioi, and maleficent ones, kakopoioi, and was transmitted to the ancient Arabs. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 483ff.; EI², s.vv. Nudjüm, ḥkām al- [T. Fahd], Sa’d wa-nahṣ (Fahd), al-Saadān⁴ (P. Kunitzsch).

Then they told him, “We’ve completed it,” and he said, “Shall I, accordingly, go forth and sit down on it?” They replied, “Yes.” He was nevertheless reluctant to sit down on it, hence rode one of his steeds and started proceeding over the dam. But while he was traveling along it, the Tigris dashed the construction away, and he only reached safety at his last gasp. He gathered them together again, and said, “By God, I will pass you along [for execution], to the last man of you, and I will tear out your shoulder joints and will throw you beneath the feet of elephants, unless you tell me faithfully the truth about this matter concerning which you have elaborated such a story for me.”

They replied, “We won’t lie to you any longer, O king. You commanded us, when [the dam on] the Tigris was breached and the arched roof of your royal palace collapsed without any weight having been put on it, to use our specialist knowledge and look into the reason behind it. We did that, but the earth became darkened and all the quarters of the heavens became covered for us. Our specialist knowledge was of no avail [literally, “came back into our hands”], so that none of the magicians’ magic nor the soothsayers’ ability to look into the future nor the astrologers’ knowledge of the stars proved efficacious. We realized that this matter originated in the heavens and that a prophet had already been sent, or was about to be sent, and because of that, something had prevented us from exercising our specialist knowledge. We were afraid that if we announced to you the destruction of your royal power, you would kill us. Like everybody else, we did not want to die, so we gave you an evasive answer in order to protect ourselves, as you saw.” Kisrā said, “Woe upon you! Why didn’t you provide me with the explanation of this matter so that I might have used my own judgment regarding what I should do?” They replied, "Our fear of you prevented us from doing that." Kisrā, therefore, let them go and gave up concerning himself with [the dam on] the Tigris when this last had got the better of him.
The Last Sasanid Kings

There related to us Humayd—Salamah—Muhammad b. Ishāq—al-Faḍl b. ʿĪsā al-Raqāshi—al-Hasan al-Basrī, who said that the Messenger of God’s Companions said, "O Messenger of God, how could God prevail over Kisrā by means of you?" The Prophet said, "God sent to him an angel, who put his hand out through the wall of the house where he was, shining with light. When Kisrā saw it, he was alarmed. The angel said, "Why are you so fearful, O Kisrā? God has sent a prophet and sent down upon him a book, so follow him, and you will be secure in this present life of yours and in the next one." Kisrā replied, "I’ll think about it."

There related to us Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Ishāq—Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhri—Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf, who said: God sent an angel to Kisrā, when he was in a room of his palace (aywānih) where no one was allowed to come into his presence. Suddenly there was, round about the time of midday at the time he was wont to take a siesta, a figure standing by his head with a staff in his hand. The figure said, "O Kisrā, are you going to submit yourself to God (a-tuslimu)? [If not,] I shall break this staff!" He replied, "Bihil, bilah!" ("Leave, leave!"), so the angelic visitant then left him. Kisrā summoned his guards and chamberlains, and became enraged at them, saying, "Who let this person come into my presence?" They replied, "No one has come into your presence, and we haven’t seen this person at all." In the following year, the angel came to him at precisely the same hour as before and spoke the same words to him as

785. That is, the great popular preacher and ascetic of al-Baṣrah in Umayyad times, the Successor Abū Saʿīd al-Hāsan b. Abī al-Ḥasan (died 110/728), subsequently regarded as the proto-Ṣufi. See EIP, s.v. Hasan al-Basrī (H. Ritter).

786. The following versions of the story of how Khusraw was warned by an angelic visitant are of the same type as the Biblical story of King Belshazzar of Chaldaea, who was warned of the imminent fall of his kingdom by the moving finger writing on the wall of his palace (Daniel, v. 5ff.).

787. Literally, "he was not mindful of it," lam yarʿīhā, echoing the Qur’ānic phrase fa-mā raʿawhā, "they [i.e., the followers of Jesus] did not cherish/look after it," of LVII, 27.

788. Persian hishtan, hilidan "to leave, depart."
before, saying, "Are you going to submit yourself to God? [If not,] I shall break this staff!" Kisrā replied three times, "Bihil, bihil, bihil," so the angelic visitant departed from him. Kisrā summoned his chamberlains, guards, and doorkeepers, and became enraged with them, saying to them what he had said to them on the first occasion. They replied, "We didn’t see anyone coming into your presence." When the third year came round, the angel came to Kisrā at exactly the same hour as he had come to him previously, and spoke the same words to him as before, saying, "Are you going to submit yourself to God? [If not,] I shall break this staff!" Kisrā replied, "Bihil, bihil." He related: At that, the angel broke his staff and departed. Only a short time afterward, his royal power disintegrated, and his son and the Persian rose in rebellion and finally killed him.

'Abdallah b. Abi Bakr—al-Zuhri,789 [who said,]: I recounted this story to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz,790 from Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Rahmān, and he said: It has been mentioned to me that the angel came into Kisrā's presence with two glass bottles in his hands and then said to him, "Submit yourself [to God]!" and when he did not comply, he smashed one of the bottles against the other and broke them into smithereens. Then he departed. Kisrā's own destruction followed, as is well known.

There related to me Yalhya b. Ja'far—'Ali b. Āṣim—Khālid al-Ḥadhdhā', who said: I heard 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Abi Bakrah say:791 Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, was asleep one night in his palace (aywān), the palace of al-Madā'in, and the cavalrymen [of the guard] were 789. That is, Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhri, often referred to as Ibn Shihāb, from the Meccan clan of Zuhrah, one of the founders of the Islamic science of tradition (died 124/743). As a teacher of Ibn Ishāq, he was a great contributor to the Sīrah of the Prophet and was much quoted by al-Ṭabari for the history of the first three Rightly-Guided caliphs. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 136–36; Ibn Ḥajār, Tuhdhib al-Tahdhib, IX, 445–51; EI', s.v. al-Zuhri [J. Horovitz].

---

790. That is, the member of the Umayyad family, governor of Medina and then the caliph 'Umar II [r. 99–101/717–20].

791. 'Abd al-Rahmān was the eldest son of the Companion Nufay' b. Masrūh, called Abū Bakrah, "the man of the pulley," and an Abyssinian mawla of the Prophet. 'Abd al-Rahmān managed his maternal uncle Ziyād b. Abīhi's property in al-BAṣrah for him, but submitted reluctantly to 'Alī after the Battle of the Camel [al-Ṭabarī, I, 3229, II, 22]. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/1, 138; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 288–89; EP, s.v. Abū Bakra [M. T. Houtsma-Ch. Pellat].
posted all around his castle. Suddenly, there appeared a man with a staff who walked up and stood at Kisrā’s head and said, "O Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God’s messenger to you [with the message that you should submit yourself [to Him]]." He said this three times, while Kisrā lay prostrate, looking at him but returning no answer. Then the angel left him. He related: Kisrā sent for the commander of the guard and said to him, "Did you allow this man to enter my presence?" The commander of the guard replied, "No, I didn’t, and no one has come in from our part."

He related: When it was the following year, Kisrā was fearful of that night and sent a message to the commander of the guard, "Post guards all round my castle and don’t let anyone enter my presence." He related: The commander of the guard did that. But when it was that precise hour, behold, there was the angel with the staff standing at his head and saying to him, "O Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God’s messenger to you [with the message that you should submit yourself [to Him], so do this, and it will be best for you!" He related: Kisrā was looking at him without giving any answer. Then the angel left him. He related: Kisrā sent for the commander of the guard [and upbraided him], "Didn’t I order you not to let anyone into my presence?" The commander of the guard replied, "O king, by God, no one has come into your presence from our part, search out whence he came into your presence."

He related: When the next year came round, it was as if he was fearful of that night, and he sent a message to the commander of the guard and the guard itself, "Stand guard all around me during this night, and don’t allow any woman or man to enter my presence." They did that. When it was that precise hour, behold, there was the angel again standing by his head and saying, "Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God’s messenger to you [with the message that you should submit yourself [to Him], so do this, and it will be best for you!" This he repeated three times, while Kisrā was looking at him but returning no answer. The angel said, "O Kisrā, you have rebuffed me! By God, God will certainly smash you just as I am smashing this staff of mine!" Then he broke it, and went away. Kisrā sent to his guard and said, "Didn’t I order you not to let anyone into my presence this night, neither wife [ahl] nor child?" They replied, "No one has come into your presence from our part.” He related: Very soon afterward, his son rose in rebellion against him and killed him. They related: Very soon afterward, his son rose in rebellion against him and killed him.\(^{792}\)

[The Encounter at Dhū Qār]

A further episode [in the story of the fall of the Sasanid empire] is what happened concerning [the tribal group of] Rabī‘ah\(^{793}\) and the army Kīsrā Abarwīz had dispatched for war against them and their subsequent encounter at Dhū Qār.

It is related from the Prophet that when the Prophet heard the news of Rabī‘ah’s rout of Kīsrā’s army, he exclaimed, “This [has been] the first military encounter (yawm) in which the Arabs have secured their just due from the Persians (intāṣafat al-‘Arab min al-‘Ajam), and it was through me that they were given the victory.” The battle of Dhū Qār\(^{794}\) is also called that of Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurāqir or Qurā that of the bend (al-hinw), the bend of Dhū Qār or the bend of Qurāqir; that of al-Jubābāt; that of Dhū al-‘Ujrum; that of al-Ghadhawān; and that of the depression (al-baṭḥā'), the depression of Dhū Qār. All of these are places around Dhū Qār.795

There was related to me a narrative going back to Abū ‘Ubaydah Ma‘mar b. al-Muthannā796—Abū al-Mukhtār Fīrās b. Khīndīf797 and a number of the scholars (‘ulamā’) of the Arabs, whom he specified by name: The battle of Dhū Qār was the consequence of al-Nu‘mān b. al-Mundhir al-Lakhmī’s killing of ‘Adī b. Zayd al-‘Ībādī. ‘Adī was one of Kisrā A‘barwīz, son of Hurmuz’s, translators (tarājīmah).798 The reason for al-Nu‘mān’s (III) killing of ‘Adī b. Zayd was what was mentioned to me in an account going back to Hishām b. Muhammad Ishaq b. al-Jāsāq, Muslim traditions which place it just after the opening of the Hijri era (e.g., a few months after the battle of Badr between the pagan Quraysh and the Muslims, hence in the later part of 624, according to Abū al-Faraj al-İsfahānī, Aghānī P, XXIV, 76) are clearly too late. The range of years for Dhū Qār is probably between 604 and 611, i.e., before the beginning of Muḥammad’s public ministry in Mecca but at a time when he could certainly have heard reports of the victory against the Persians and their allies.

795. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 293, it lay to the south of what soon afterward became the Arab misr of al-Kūfah, and cannot have been far from the Euphrates, hence in a region where the nomads’ herds could have ready access to water. It seems impossible to pinpoint it more exactly, although there were presumably bituminous springs bubbling to the surface there (qār, qir “pitch, tar”).

796. Abū ‘Ubaydah [d. 209 or 210/824–25], philologist and grammarian, was a mawlā of Mesopotamian origin who became the most learned authority of his time on the tribal history and lore of the early Arabs. He also achieved a later reputation, which does not in fact seem to be justified, as a zealous supporter of the claims of the Shu‘aybiyyah, those vaunting the cultural supremacy of the ‘Ājam, in effect the Persians, over the Arabs. See EP, s.v. Abū ‘Ubayda [H.A.R. Gibb], EIr, s.v. Abū ‘Ubayda Ma‘mar [C. E. Bosworth].

797. Following what seems to be the correct emendation, following Addenda et emendanda, p. 3xcri, for this personal and tribal name (Khīndīf b. Muḍar: cf. Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 1, II, 2, 347, and also n. 430 above).

798. See on ‘Adī, n. 116 above.
who took it from the book of ھامّاد [الرَّوْيَیَّه]. 799 and my father also mentioned part of the story to me. He said: یزید ب. ھامّاد ب. یزید ب. یعْب ب. ماهرف ب. ًامیر ب. ًعساّیّه ب. ًب. طامّم 800 had three sons: the poet ًادی، who was a handsome man, both poet and orator (کهّتیب)، who had read the books of the Arabs and the Persians, 801 ًاممار، who was also called عبّاض و ًامرف، who was also called سعّمیة. They had a uterine brother called ًادی ب. ہانّزلا، from the [tribe of] ًتیّی. ًاممار used to stay at كیسرة’s court. One of the two of them ardently desired the death of ًادی ب. یزید؛ the other was a firm devotee of Christianity. They all belonged to a notable house whose members were close to the كیسرة، eating their food with them and staying at their side, and receiving from them land grants (قَاتَّیہ).

When ًالمَنْدِیر (IV) ب. ًالمَنْدِیر (III) became king, 802 he entrusted his son ًالنَّوْمَان to ًادی’s care; it was this family who fostered him (and reared him). Now ًالمَنْدِیر had another son called ًال-*عَسَد، whose mother was مَریمہ ب. ًعَلیّہ ب. ًجُلّعم، from the [tribe of] ًتیم ال-ریبّ. There fostered 803 and

799. ھامّاد ب. مَسّرَح، called بَلّل، al-رَّوْيَیَّه (“the great transmitter”), d. 155 or 156/772-73, of Persian mawًلأ stock, was famed as a collector of ancient Arabic poetry but also suspected of forging some of this. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 366-38; ًف. ًھامّاد al-رَّوْیَیّا (J. W. Fück).

800. ًنولدکه، trans. 312 n. 5, noted that the appearance of the name ًعْب in ًادی’s nasab, as the poet’s great-great-grandfather, indicates the ancientness of Christianity within the family. He further noted that, for ًعْب to have been born four generations back from ًادی (who must himself have been born ca. 554, in J. Horovitz’s view), he must have been in extreme old age if he is to be identified with the person mentioned (together with the comes Angeleios (?), son of ًزید) in the Martyrium Arethae as ًیُب/ًعْب، ًئّنارح of the Christian community in al-ْهَرّع، and as being a member of the entourage of the Lakhmid al-مَنْدِیر III ب. ًالنٰعْضن II. The “house of ًعْب” was clearly important, through its literacy and its practical skills, in the secretarial and diplomatic service of both the Lakhmids and the ساسانِیّد. See further Horovitz, “ًادی ابن ًزید، the Poet of ًهَرّع,” 32-34 [also translates, 40ff., the detailed account of ًبَوُل-الفَرَج al-یسَفّانی in Aghānī, II, 95ff., much fuller than the account given here by al-مَتّاباری]; ًشادید، Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century. I/1, 315-18.

801. ًنولدکه trans. 313 n. 1, commented that there could hardly have been any books written in Arabic at this time, but only orally transmitted poetry and possibly tales, and that, when the Christian Arabs of a city like al-ْهَرّع did write, they would use Syriac.

802. That is, in ca. 575.

803. This passage in parentheses was supplied by ًنولدکه in his text, n. d. from the parallel passage in Aghānī, II, 105.
reared him a family from the people of al-Ḥirah called the Banū Marīnā, who were considered a part of Lakhm and were of noble status (ashrāf). As well as these two, al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir had ten other sons. Because of their handsome appearance, the entire group of his sons were known as al-Asḥāhib ("the Shining Ones"), as al-Aʾshā says:

The sons of al-Mundhir, the Shining Ones, go forth in the morning in al-Ḥirah with their swords.

Al-Nuʿmān was red haired (or: had a reddish complexion, ahmar), with a mottled skin, and was short of stature. His mother was called Salmā (or Sulmā) bt. Wāʾil b. ʿAṭiyah al-Ṣāʿīgh ("the goldsmith"), from the people of Fadak; she was a slave girl of al-Ḥārīth b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḍamḍam b. ʿAdī b. Janābʾs, from [the tribe of] Kalb. Qābūs b. al-Mundhir the Elder, the paternal uncle of al-Nuʿmān and his brothers, had sent ʿAdī b. Zayd and his brothers to Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, these being secretaries and translators of his. When al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir died, leaving behind those thirteen sons of his, Iyās b. Qabīsah al-Ṭāʾī was given charge of his 804. For this family, see Rothstein, Lahmiden, 20, 110. It was of such prominence in the life of the city that the poet Imruʿ al-Asayr speaks of al-Ḥirah as diyar Bani Marīnā. See Diwān, 200, no. 37 v. 3, and cf. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 67.

---

The situation thus evolved in al-Ḥirah of al-Nuʿmān being supported for the succession there by ʿAdī b. Zayd and al-Aswād by the Banū Marīnā; ʿAdī, however, had a distinct advantage through his honored status at the Sasanid court. See Rothstein, ibid., 109-10.

806. Nöldeke, trans. 314 n. 1, noted that this description is confirmed, in another context, in Aghānī, XXXI, 2.

807. This maternal origin is confirmed in Ḥamzah al-Isfahānī, Taʾrikh, 95, and Abū al-Faraj al-Isfahānī, Aghānī, 13, but al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, III, 202 = § 1061, says that Salmā was of the Kalb.

As Nöldeke, noted, trans. 314 n. 2, Fadak, a settlement in the Wādi al-Qurā of western Ḥijāz, had a significant Jewish element, famed as workers in precious metals. It is thus possible that Salmā came from this population group; the poet ʿAmr b. Kulthūm al-Ṭaghlibī satirized al-Nuʿmān, that his mother's relatives were smiths and weavers, practicing despised crafts (Aghānī, XI, 58-59, and a satire attributed to al-Nābigah al-Dhubyānī by one of his enemies describes al-Nuʿmān as wārith al-ṣāʿīgh "heir of the goldsmith" [ibid., XI, 13; cf. Rothstein, Lahmiden, 108-109].

808. Following Nöldeke, trans. 314 n. 3, one should read here "Kisrā, son of Qubbād," i.e., Anūsharwān, and not "Kisrā [Abarwiz], son of Hurmuz."

809. That is, in 580.
governmental responsibilities, but only held this office for a few months while Kisra was searching for a man he could appoint as ruler over the Arabs. At that juncture, Kisra, son of Hormizd, summoned 'Adi b. Zayd and said to him, "Who now remains of al-Mundhir's sons? What sort of persons are they, and is there any good amongst them?" 'Adi replied, "There are still some of them left from the sons of the recently deceased al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir; those are real men!" Kisra said, "Send for them!" So he wrote to the various sons, and they came to Kisra, who assigned them lodging with 'Adi b. Zayd. 'Adi gave preferential treatment in regard to lodging and hospitality to al-Nu'man's brothers over al-Nu'man himself, and he would let them see that he expected nothing from al-Nu'man. He spoke with them individually and privately, and said to each of them, "If the king asks you, 'Can you control the Arabs for me?' then tell him, 'Yes, we can control them all for you, except al-Nu'man.'" 'Adi said to al-Nu'man, however, "If the king asks you about your brothers, tell him, 'If I can't cope with them, then I can't cope with anybody else!"

810. That is, Hormizd [see n. 811 below] appointed him as temporary governor of al-Hirah. It was Iyas b. Qabisah who was, nearly a quarter of a century later, appointed [this time by Khusrav II Abarwêz] governor or ruler in al-Hirah after the Lakhmid al-Nu'man's deposition in 602. At some point, the Persian king awarded Iyas thirty villages along the Euphrates as a grant for life and made him administrator of the district of 'Ayn al-Tamr [see on this place n. 112 above]. See EP Suppl., s.v. Iyas b. Qabisah al-Ta'i (Ch. Pellat). Nödecke, 314 n. 5, opined that the Qabisah of AghamIII, II, 22, i.e., Iyas's father, fitted better chronologically for this appointment by Hormizd, but a period of twenty-two years during which Iyas was occupied with other charges along Persia's frontier with the north Arabian desert does not seem an excessive amount out of a man's official career, and in any case, the same passage in AghamIII, II, 106, has "Iyas b. Qabisah" for the interim governor in al-Hirah before the choice of al-Nu'man was made.

811. Read here "Hurmuz, son of Kisra."
812. That is, of the progeny of al-Nu'man's grandfather al-Mundhir III [r. 504-54].
813. That is, al-Nu'man is to stress to Hormizd his ability to cope with rivals and with other unruly elements along the desert fringes of the Persian realm. Nödecke, trans. 315 n. 3, noted further that in the more detailed account of AghamIII, II, 107-108, 'Adi gives al-Nu'man advice which will project himself to the Persian king as a tough and spartan son of the desert: that he should appear before Hormizd in travel-stained clothes, girt with his sword, and exhibiting a voracious appetite. At the same time, 'Adi craftily instructs the other brothers to wear their most opulent clothes, to eat in an elegant and restrained manner, and generally to present themselves as refined, ineffective characters, useless for the envisaged task of guarding the frontiers.
There was a man from the Banū Marīnā called 'Adī b. Aws b. Marīnā, a headstrong fellow who was also a poet and who used to say repeatedly to al-Aswād [b. al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir], “You know that I expect some favor from you [or perhaps, “am well disposed toward you, am concerned for your welfare,” annī laka rājīn]. I beg and implore you not to follow ‘Adī b. Zayd’s counsel, for by God, he never has your good interests at heart.” But al-Aswād paid no attention to his words.

When Kīsrā ordered ‘Adi b. Zayd to bring them into his presence, ‘Adi began to lead them in one by one, so that Kīsrā might speak with each of them; he found that he was looking at a group of men whose like he had rarely seen. When he asked them, “Are you able to fulfill this office for me, as your family previously filled it?” They replied, “We can control the Arabs for you, except al-Nu’mān.”

When al-Nu’mān went into Kīsrā’s presence, the latter perceived an ugly and ill-favored person. Nevertheless, when Kīsrā addressed him and asked, “Can you control the Arabs for me?” he answered, “Yes!” Kīsrā asked, “How will you deal with your brethren?” Al-Nu’mān replied [mockingly], “If I can’t cope with them, then I can’t cope with anyone!” Kīsrā thereupon appointed him ruler, gave him robes of honour and a crown valued at sixty thousand dirhams and set with pearls and gold.

Al-Nu’mān went forth, having been just appointed thus. [At this point,] ‘Adī b. Aws b. Marīnā said to al-Aswād, “Now you’ve done it! You have gone against the correct course of action!” Then ‘Adī b. Zayd prepared a feast in a church, and sent a message to Ibn Marīnā, “Come along to me, and bring whomever you like, for I need to say something [to you].” Hence Ibn Marīnā went to him with a group of people. They all feasted and drank at a morning meal in the church. ‘Adī [b. Zayd] said to ‘Adī b. Marīnā, “O ‘Adī, people like you know how best to recognize good conduct and then to avoid blaming [anyone] for it. I realize that you would have preferred your candidate al-Aswād b. al-Mundhir to have been 814. Nöldeke follows the first of these interpretations in his trans., 216.

---

815. ‘Adī’s scheming has thus secured the authority in al-Hirah for al-Nu’mān (cf. Rothstein, Lahmiden, 111), but at the price of making powerful enemies in the city.
appointed rather than my candidate al-Nu‘mān, but don’t blame me for something which you yourself would have done [if you had been able]. I would not like you to hate me for a course of action which you yourself would have followed had you been able. I would further like you to treat me with the same consideration as I show to you, for my share in the royal power is no more extensive than your own share."

‘Adī b. Zayd then arose and went to the church and took an oath that he would not satirize ‘Adī b. Marīnā in his poetry, would never intend any wicked act against him, and would never keep back from him anything good. But when ‘Adī b. Zayd had finished saying this, ‘Adī b. Marīnā stood up and swore a similar oath that he would never cease satirizing ‘Adī b. Zayd and never cease intending evil against him as long as he lived. Al-Nu‘mān now went forth and took up his residence at al-Ḥirah.

‘Adī b. Aws b. Marīnā recited these verses regarding ‘Adī b. Zayd:

Ho there, announce to ‘Adī from ‘Adī, and do not grieve, even though your physical power has become worn out. You are despoiling our places of worship when you have no need for such gains, merely in order that you may be praised or your gain may be more complete. If you are now successful, you will not be successful in a praiseworthy manner; and if you perish, we shall wish someone else, and not you, to be not far from us [in death].

---

816. The Cairo text, II, 196, has here khabar, "any piece of information," for khayr, "anything good," the latter being the reading, however, in Abū al-Faraj al-Īsfahānī, Aghānī3, II, 108.

817. Following the emendations in the text, I, 1019 n. a and in Addenda et emendanda, p. xciv for the first hemistich of this verse. The reference here to "despoiling our hayākil" seems to refer, as Nöldeke noted, trans. 315 n. 3, to ‘Adī’s obtaining a loan of eighty thousand dirhams from the bishop of al-Ḥirah, Jābir b. Sham‘ūn, on al-Nu‘mān’s behalf so that the latter could inflate and strengthen his position in the Persian king’s eyes. See Aghānī3, II, 115; Rothstein, Lahmiden, 111 n. 2.

818. Literally, "may someone else, not you, not be far from us [in death]!" fa-lā yab‘ad siwāka, a motif familiar in ancient Arabian elegiac poetry, in which the spirit of a dead man, a companion, or kinsman, is enjoined lá tab‘ad, "do not go far away in death!" See Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 255–56, Eng. tr. C.
You will feel regret like the man of Kusa' when your two eyes see what your hands have wrought.\textsuperscript{819}

'Adi b. Marīnā likewise said to al-Aswad, "Although you have not been successful, do not be so weak as to forgo seeking vengeance on this man of Ma'add, who has treated you in this fashion.\textsuperscript{820} I have kept on telling you that the crafty wiles of Ma'add are never at rest, and I enjoined you not to follow his ways; but you acted against my advice." He replied, "What do you want, then?" Ibn Marīnā said, "I want you to hand over to me all the income from your sources of wealth and land," and al-Aswad did that. Ibn Marīnā was [already] very rich and well endowed with estates. No day now ever passed without a present arriving at al-Nu'mān's portal from Ibn Marīnā, so that the latter became the most honored of men in al-Nu'mān's eyes, and he did not decide any matter of state without 'Adi b. Marīnā's instructions. Whenever 'Adi b. Zayd's name was mentioned in Ibn Marīnā's presence, he would heap praises on him and recount his merits, yet he would add, "The make-up of a man of Ma'add is not complete without there being an element of craft and treachery in it."

When the persons in al-Nu'mān's court circle perceived the high status of Ibn Marīnā in the king's sight, they attached themselves to him and followed him. He began to tell his most trusted followers, "When you see me mentioning 'Adi b. Zayd with approbation to the king, say, 'Indeed, he is just like you say, but he doesn't leave anybody alone but keeps on saying that the king—he meant al-Nu'mān—is merely his governor and that he secured al-

\textsuperscript{819} The "regret of the man of Kusa'" was proverbial for someone who committed an irrevocable action and then repented of it. Kusa' is variously described as a clan or subgroup of archers of Qays 'Aylān, Yemen, or Ḥimyar, but no such tribal division is registered by Ibn al-Kalbi in his \textit{Jamharat al-nasab}; clearly, the lexicographers had no real idea of the origin of the saying. See Ibn Manẓūr, \textit{Lisān al-'arab}, X, 186–87; al-Zabidi, \textit{Tāj al-ʻarūs}, V, 494–95.

\textsuperscript{820} 'Adi's genealogy, set forth by al-Ṭabarānī at \textit{I}, 1016, p. 340 above, went back to the Zayd Manāt b. Imri' al-Qays, one of the two main branches of the great North Arab tribe of Tamīm (see Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, \textit{Jamharat al-nasab}, I, Table 59, II, 8, 544; \textit{EP}, s.v. Tamīm b. Murr (M. Lecker)), whereas most of the Arabs in al-Ḥira, from the ruling Lakhmid family downward, stemmed from tribes accounted Yemeni in \textit{nasab}.\textsuperscript{1020}
Nu'mân’s appointment to the office which he now holds.’” They kept on thus repeatedly until they caused the king to be full of hatred toward 'Adi b. Zayd. Also, they wrote a letter in 'Adi’s name to one of his stewards (qahramân) and then laid a plot against him to seize the letter, which they then brought to al-Nu'mân. The latter read it, and it filled him with rage. He sent a message to 'Adi b. Zayd in these terms: “I beseech you, why haven’t you visited me? I have been longing to see you.” 'Adi was at this juncture at Kisrâ’s court; he asked Kisrâ for permission to leave, and the latter gave this. But when 'Adi came to al-Nu'mân, he had hardly set eyes on al-Nu'mân before he was thrown into a prison, where no one came to visit him.821 'Adi b. Zayd set about composing verses while he was in prison. The first of the verses which he composed there was:

Would that I knew something from the great hero (i.e., the king)! Then would a tenderly persuasive enquiry bring you authentic news [of him]!822

He further recited many other pieces of poetry.823

---

821. In the second of Abû al-Faraj al-Iṣfahâni’s accounts of the estrangement between al-Nu'mân and 'Adi, in Aghanî, II, 115–16, that stemming from al-Muafaḍal b. Muhammad al-Ḍabbi, to the reasons for this estrangement set forth in the first account from Ibn al-Kalbi, essentially that given above by al-Ṭabârî, al-Muafaḍal adds another cause, also involving 'Adi’s enemy Ibn Marînâ. According to this, 'Adi grew angry with al-Nu'mân because he had prepared for al-Nu'mân and his entourage a splendid feast, but en route for this, al-Nu'mân was intercepted by Ibn Marînâ who invited him on the spot to a feast of his own so that, when al-Nu'mân eventually arrived at 'Adi's feast, he was satiated and oculd not touch any of it. 'Adi was naturally piqued, displayed his anger, reproached al-Nu'mân in verse and broke off relations with him. In retaliation, al-Nu'mân consigned 'Adi to prison.

822. Diwân, 56, no. 7 v. 2, a verse from a long poem, more of which is cited in other sources such as Aghanî, II, 110.

823. When Nöldeke made his translation, he stated, 319 n. 2, that the verses of 'Adi had to be recovered from scattered citations in later sources. A formal diwân of 'Adi's collected poetry is mentioned in several mediaeval Islamic sources, e.g., Ibn al-Nadîm and Abû al-'Alâ' al-Mâ'ârî, as being in existence at that time, with various copies circulating in Baghdad. However, the Diwân of 'Adi has now been published by Muḥammad Jabbâr al-Mu‘aybîd on the basis of a unique manuscript, preserved at al-Bâṣrah, of the work of Jâhili poets and called Kitâb jamhurat shu'ârâ' al-'Arab min al-Jâhiliyyah; see al-Mu‘aybîd's Introduction, 20–25.

As Nöldeke commented, loc. cit., the poetry of 'Adi, the product of an urban, Christianised environment, is perceptibly easier to understand than the verses of contemporary Bedouin poets, products of the ruder, harsher desert.
Whenever 'Adī composed some poetry, this came to al-Nu'mān’s notice and hearing, and he felt regret for having imprisoned him. He began to send messages to 'Adī, making him various promises and arousing his hopes [of being freed], but shrank from releasing him lest 'Adī should then intend some evil against him. 'Adī thereupon uttered the verse:

I lay awake in a thick, dark cloud in which lightning flashes continually rose up on the gray mountain peaks.824 and also,

That night was long for us and intensely dark.825

And also,

Ho there, the nights and the days are long!826

When he became wearied of addressing entreaties to al-Nu'mān, he recited poetry in which he reminded him of death and informed him of those kings before him who had perished, saying,

Has farewell been said to him when he was setting out in the morning or at even?827 and many other poems.

He related: Al-Nu‘mān once set out for al-Bahrayn, and [in his absence] a man from Ghassān appeared and wrought whatever violence he willed in al-Hīrah. It is said that the person who attacked al-Hīrah and then put it to flames was Jafnah b. al-Nu‘mān al-Jafnī.828 'Adī recited:

824. Diwān, 37, no. 3 v. 1.
825. ibid., 59, no. 8 v. 1.
826. ibid., 132, no. 60 v. 1.
827. ibid., 84, no. 16 v. 1.
828. This refers to a major, surprise attack on the Lakhmid capital involving an operation mounted across the Syrian Desert by the Jafnid/Ghassānid prince, who plundered al-Hīrah and pitched his praetorium or military headquarters there for five days, while the Lakhmid ruler was absent, as 'Adī’s scornful verse stresses. The Jafnid/Ghassānid prince would be al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith or Arethas (r. 569–82). Nöldeke, Die Ghassānischen Fürsten, 27–28, placed the attack in 580–81, commenting that it could not in any case have happened after 591 when the emperor Maurice and Khusraw Abarwēz made peace, since the Byzantine ruler would not have allowed his Syrian vassal to breach the agreement thus; see also
A falcon soared high, and then set both sides of it (i.e., the town of al-Hirah) in flames, while you were completely occupied with camels, some of which are sent out to travel by night while others are left to pasture freely.829

When 'Adi's imprisonment became protracted, he wrote the following verses to his brother Ubayy, who was at Kisra's court,

Convey the news to Ubayy, however far away he is—is what a man has come to know any use to him?—
—That your brother, the dear one of your heart, for whom you were intensely concerned while ever he was safe and sound, is shackled with iron fetters in the power of a king, whether justly or unjustly.
So let me not find you acting like a woman with a child (dhāt al-ghulāmi) if she does not find a suckler of her breast, seeking for such an one.
So take care to remain in your own land, for if you come to us you will sleep a dreamless slumber (i.e., will find death)!830

His brother wrote back to him,

If Fate has betrayed you, then you are no weakling (literally, "weak of outstretched arms"), nor an inactive person, nor a feeble one.

trans. 320 n. 3. This seems a reasonable argument, and the attack must in any case have happened well before al-Nu'mān's imprisonment of 'Adi toward the year 600. Rothstein, Lahmiden, 104 n. 2, 105, 112, however, placed the attack earlier than Nödeke. More recently, Irfan Shahid has dated the attack to 575, at the end of the three years' period when al-Mundhir b. al-Hārith had withdrawn from Byzantine service and was keen to retaliate on the Lakhmids for their raids on the Syrian frontiers during that period. The Lakhmid ruler at that time would thus be al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III rather than the energetic al-Nu'mān III, ruling by ca. 580. The mention of the Jafnid/Ghassānid attacker as being "Jafnah b. al-Nu'mān al-Jafni" in the account transmitted by Abū 'Ubaydah is thus both vague and inaccurate.

830. ibid., 164, no. 111 vv. 1–5. The message of the last two verses is that Ubayy should not assume a task, that of avenging his brother 'Adi, which is no part of his business—at least, not by immediately coming to the Lakhmid court seeking vengeance and instead finding there his own certain death. Nödeke, trans. 321 n. 1, was uncertain about the rendering of v. 4, but the enlightening emendations in Addenda et emendanda, p. dxxiv, and Glossarium, p. ccclxix, make it clear that the proverbial saying given in Lane, Lexicon, 2025a, is being alluded to here.
By God's oath, even if a darkly massed, mighty, crushing force, with gleaming swords, With a distant roaring sound, advancing across country with an overwhelming host bringing death, with robes of battle intact and enfolding them, Had I been in the thick of its throng, I would have hastened to you; so know that I would have responded when you asked for succor! Or if I had been asked for money for you, neither inherited wealth nor wealth which had been earned for some specific purpose would have been held back. Or [if you had been] in a land and I could have come to you there, neither its distance away nor any fearsome danger would have affrighted me. Since you are far away from me, the glory of this age and the authority to command are with the enemy. If, by God, I am bereft of you, an old companion whose loss brings pain, there is no one who can replace you, while ever the autumn rains pour forth. Indeed, by my life, if I grieve over you, it is as an afflicted, sad one. Indeed, by my life, if I manage to regain control and find consolation, nevertheless there will be few like you in the lands through which I range.

They assert that, when Ubayy read 'Adi's letter, he went along to Kisrā and spoke with him [about the affair]. Kisrā thereupon wrote a letter and sent an envoy with it. Al-Nu'mān's deputy in the exercise of government (khalifah) wrote to al-Nu'mān that Kisrā had sent a letter to him. At that, 'Adi's enemies from the Banū Buqaylah of Ghassān went along to al-Nu'mān and said,
"Kill him immediately!" but he refused. The envoy arrived, having been first accosted by 'Adi's brother, who gave him money as a bribe and told him to visit 'Adi first. The envoy went to 'Adi, the latter being incarcerated in [the fortress of] Sinnîn.835 'Adi's brother said, "Go into his presence and see what instructions he gives you." The envoy went into 'Adi's presence and said, "I have brought the order for your release; what have you got [for me]?") 'Adi said, "Something you will like very much," and gave him promises, adding, however, "Don't leave me, but give me the letter so that I may convey it to him [i.e., al-Nu'mân], for by God, if you leave me, then I shall undoubtedly be killed." The envoy replied, "I can't do anything except go to the king and deliver the letter to him personally."

Meanwhile, someone went along to al-Nu'mân to let him know what was happening. This person came to al-Nu'mân and told him, "Kisrâ's envoy has been to visit 'Adi, and is going to bring 'Adi with him. If he does that, he will not spare any of us, neither yourself nor anyone else." Al-Nu'mân thereupon sent 'Adi's enemies to him, and they smothered him till he died, and then buried him. The envoy came into al-Nu'mân's presence with the letter. Al-Nu'mân hailed him with the words, "Good fortune and welcome!" and sent him four thousand mithqâls836 (i.e., in silver dirhams) and a slave girl, saying to him, "When you go along to 'Adi next morning, go in to him and bring him back personally."

But when the envoy rode out to there next morning and entered the prison, the guards told him, "He has already been dead for several days; we didn't, however, dare to tell the king out of fear of him, since we knew that he did not desire 'Adi's death." The envoy returned to al-Nu'mân and said, "I went into his presence

835. This was a fortress of the district of al-Ḥirah, mentioned in the account of Sa'd b. Abî Waqqâs's attack on al-Ḥirah in 14/635 (al-Tabârî, I, 2233). According to Ḥâṃzâh al-Iṣfahânî, Ta'rîkh, 90, it was built by the Greek architect Sinnimâr, the luckless constructor of al-Khawarmaq (see al-Tabârî, I, 851–52, pp. 75–78 above). See Yâqût, Buldân, III, 431; Nöldeke, trans. 322 n. 3 [on the most probable Aramaic etymology of the toponym]; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 117–18 [mentioning what he identified as the ruins of Sinnîn and its castle]; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 152.

836. For this measure for precious metals and monetary unit, based on the weight of the Byzantine gold, solidus, see Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 1–8; EP, s.v. Makâyil and Mawâzin (E. Ashtor).
[yesterday] and he was still alive!” Al-Nu‘mān told him, “The king sends you to me, and you go to ‘Adī before me? You’re lying, and you’re only seeking bribe money and stirring up mischief!” He threatened him but then gave him increased largesse and marks of favor, and extracted a promise from him that he would merely tell Kisrā that ‘Adī had died before he could go to him. So the envoy returned to Kisrā and informed him that ‘Adī had died before he could get access to him. Al-Nu‘mān was filled with remorse at ‘Adī’s death, but ‘Adī’s enemies behaved menacingly toward him, and he was violently afraid of them.

Al-Nu‘mān went out hunting one day and met one of ‘Adī’s sons called Zayd. When he saw him, he recognized his resemblance to ‘Adī and asked him, “Who are you?” The son replied, “I am Zayd
b. ‘Adī b. Zayd,” Al-Nu‘mān spoke with him and found him to be a finely formed young man, and he rejoiced at this (or, “in him”) greatly. He introduced him into his court circle, gave him gifts, made excuses to him over the matter of his father,837 and fitted him out handsomely with a traveling kit. Then he wrote to Kisrā in these terms: “‘Adī was, because of his wise counsel and his intelligence, one of those persons who are the supports of kings; but the inevitable fate came upon him, his life span was fulfilled and his sustenance was cut off; no one was more deeply afflicted by his death than myself. Yet a king does not lose one of his men without God sending along a replacement for him, since God has made the king’s royal power and exalted status so mighty. Now one of ‘Adī’s sons, not inferior to him in qualities, has just reached maturity. Hence I have sent him along to the king, if he sees fit to appoint him in his father’s stead, he may do so.”

When the young man came to Kisrā, he appointed him to his father’s old office and transferred his paternal uncle (i.e., Ubayy) to another post. So it was Zayd who took charge of correspondence dispatched to the land of the Arabs—in particular, [that of] the king. The Arabs gave him a specific, annual payment for filling this office, namely, two chestnut-colored colts, fresh truffles in their season and dried ones, dried and compacted cheese, hides [or, “seasonings,” al-udum], and other products traded by the Arabs.

837. That is, over his being imprisoned and not, of course, over his killing. See Nöldeke, trans. 324 n. 1.
Zayd b. 'Adi b. Zayd was thus in charge of all this—that is, those functions 'Adi b. Zayd had exercised. When Zayd had attained such a position in Kisra's eyes, the latter asked him about al-Nu'man; Zayd praised him profusely.

Zayd accordingly remained for several years filling the same role his father had filled. Kisra was highly pleased with him, and Zayd used frequently to go into his presence. The Persian kings possessed the description of a [perfect] woman, written down and kept by them, and they used to send that description out to all those lands (i.e., to obtain for themselves such ideal wives and concubines), except that they never had any dealings with the land of the Arabs regarding this and would never seek it. At one point, the king again took steps for seeking out women, and sent out that written description. Then Zayd went into Kisra's presence and spoke to him about the course of action the king had embarked upon, and said, "I see that the king has sent out letters concerning women who are to be sought out for him [as partners]. I have read the description. I know the house of al-Mundhir very well. Your servant al-Nu'man has many daughters and paternal nieces and other members of his family, totaling more than twenty women, who correspond to this description." Kisra said, "In that case, you should write off concerning them." Zayd replied, "O king, the worst characteristic of the Arabs, and of al-Nu'man [in particular], is that they regard themselves as superior in nobility, as they conceive themselves, to the Persians. I am afraid that he will conceal these women. But if I personally go to him with this mission, he will not be able to place them in concealment. So send me, together with a man from your own guard who is a skilled Arabic speaker." Hence Kisra sent with him a sturdy man. Zayd set off with the latter. He began to treat that man in a noble and friendly fashion until he reached al-Hirah. He went into al-Nu'man's presence and extolled the monarch, then went on to say that "He [Kisra] requires women [as attendants] for his wives and children, and desires to show you honor, hence has sent this mission to you." Al-Nu'man asked, "What kind of women are these [who are required]?” Zayd answered, “This is the description of them.”

The description stemmed from al-Mundhir the Elder’s\textsuperscript{839} forwarding as a present for Anūsharwān a slave girl whom he had acquired as plunder when he had raided al-Ḥārith the Elder al-Ghassānī, son of Abū Shamir,\textsuperscript{840} and whose description he had sent in a letter to Anūsharwān:

“[She is] of medium height, with a clear skin color and fine teeth, white, gleaming like the moon, pronounced eyebrows, dark and wide eyed, with a high, aquiline nose, slender eyelashes over fine eyes, smooth cheeks, with a delectable body, plentiful hair, a good-sized skull so that ear-drops hang far apart, with a high neck, a wide bosom, and well-rounded breasts. [She has] stout shoulder and upper arm bones, fine wrists, delicate hands with long and straight fingers; a pulled-in abdomen, neat waist, slender at the girdle, ample hips, a well-rounded rear and strong thighs, a fine posterior and fleshy buttocks, good-sized knees, filled-out calves so that her ornamental anklets fit snugly, but with delicate ankle bones and feet. [She walks] with slow steps, is somnolent and remains inside in the fierce light of day and has a tender skin where this is exposed. [She is] obedient to her lord and master, not flat-nosed or with a tanned skin, humble and submissive although of noble birth and not brought up in penurious circumstances, modest, sedate, mild in character, and steady minded. [She has] noble maternal relatives\textsuperscript{841} and she is satisfied with her paternal lineage, without reference to her clan, and with her clan without reference to her tribe. Experience of life has made her of fine conduct and attainments (adab). Her ways of thought are those of \textsuperscript{839}. That is, the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III (r. 504-54, interrupted by the Kindi occupation of al-Ḥirah in the mid-52os).

\textsuperscript{840}. That is, the Jafnid/Ghassānid al-Ḥārith (Arethas) (r. 529-69), son of Abū Shamir Jabalah (d. 528). See Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, 1/1, 69.

\textsuperscript{841}. Following the emendation al-ḥāl of Addenda et emendanda, p. DXXIV, for the text’s al-ḥāl.
noble people, but her actions those of the poor and needy. [She is] skillful with her hands, restrained with her tongue, has a gentle voice; she is an adornment to the house, and puts the enemy to shame. If you wish for [sexual contact with] her, she shows eagerness for it; if you prefer to leave her alone, she is content to abstain. She becomes wide eyed [with sexual longing], her cheeks blush red, her lips tremble, and she hastens toward you before you can fall upon her."842

Kisrā accepted this description and ordered it to be set down in permanent form in his chancery registers. [The Persian rulers] kept on handing it down to each other until it finally reached Kisrā, son of Hurmuz.

Zayd read out the description to al-Nu'mān, but the latter found the topic distasteful, and said to Zayd, with the envoy listening at the same time, "Aren't all the wide-eyed ones ('īn) of the Sawād and Persia enough to fulfill your needs?" The envoy said to Zayd, "What are the 'wide-eyed ones'?"843 He replied, "Wild cows (al-baqar)."844 Zayd said to al-Nu'mān, "Kisrā only desires to show you honor; if he had known that this [demand] was distressing for you, he would not have written to you in these terms." Al-Nu'mān gave them both hospitality for two days and then wrote to Kisrā, "That which the king seeks I do not possess," and he told Zayd, "Make my excuses to the king."

When Zayd went back to Kisrā, he told the envoy who had come with him, "Tell the king everything you heard from al-Nu'mān, for I shall give him the same account as you and not contradict you at all regarding it." When the two of them went into Kisrā's presence, Zayd said, "This is his letter," and he read it out to him. Kisrā retorted, "Where, then is what you [previously] told me about?” Zayd said, “I told you about their (i.e., the Arabs’) tenaciousness in keeping their women from others, and that this arises from their miserable way of life; they prefer starvation and nakedness to satiety and fine clothes, and the fiery and tempestuous winds to the ease and pleasantness of this land of yours, to the point that they call it a prison.845 Now just ask this envoy who accompanied me about what he [i.e., al-Nu‘mān] said, for I have too great a regard for the king’s exalted position to be able to repeat what he said and the answer that he gave the king.” Kīsrā thereupon asked the envoy, “What did he say?” The envoy replied, “He said, O king, ‘Hasn’t he got enough from the wild cows of the Sawād without seeking after what we ourselves have?’” Signs of anger became apparent in Kīsrā’s face and he felt violently moved in his heart, but he merely remarked, “Many a wretch has had worse things than this in mind, yet his intentions have come to naught in the end!” These words became generally circulated and reached the ears of al-Nu‘mān.

842. This bravura piece of rhetorical prose, with its balanced phrases and rhymes, appears also in Abū al-Faraj al-Isfahānī, Aghānī, II, 29–30, with various divergencies of wording. On the theme of descriptions of female beauty in Iranian and Persian literatures, from the Avesta onward, see Elr s.v. Erotic Literature (Djalal Khaleghi-Motlagh).

843. aʿyān, f. aʿyñā, pl. in, "wide-eyed, dark-eyed," is a favorite attribute of the wild cow or oryx, and thence, of women, in early Arabic poetry, appearing in the Qurān as a description of the houris of the Paradise intended for the justified believers, e.g., in XXXVII, 47/49, XLIV, 54, LI, 20, LVI, 20.

Kīsrā then remained silent regarding this topic for several months. Al-Nu‘mān, meanwhile, was preparing for whatever might befall and was expecting [the worst], when Kīsrā’s letter reached him [containing the command]: “Come here, for the king has business with you!” He set off [precipitately] when the king’s letter reached him, taking with him his weapons and whatever else he was able [to carry]. He arrived at the two mountains of Ṭayyī’,846 accompanied by [his wife] Far‘ah bt. Sa‘d b. Ḥārīthah b. Lām, who had borne him both a male and a female child, and also [his wife] Zaynab. bt. Aws b. Ḥārīthah [b. Lām]. Al-Nu‘mān made for the land of the Ṭayyī’, hoping that they would take him in among themselves and protect him, but they refused to do this, saying, “Were it not for the marriage bonds between us, we would

845. Contrasting the harshness and misery of the desert existence of the Bedouins with the ease of life in the ḏād or settled lands such as al-Ḥīrah and the Persian lands in Mesopotamia.

846. The “two mountains of Ṭayyī’,” Aja’ and Salmā, were in what is now the Jabal Shammar of northern Najd, to the south and southeast of modern Ḥā’il, and are often mentioned in old poetry. See al-Bakrī, Mu‘jam mā ista‘jam, I, 109–10, III, 750; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 94–99, III, 238–39; Musil, Northern Neqād, a Topographical Itinerary, New York 1928, 76–77, 88–89; Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der alt-arabischen Poesie, 26, 90.
attack you, for we do not want to be drawn into enmity with Kisrā.\textsuperscript{847} Al-Nu‘mān went onward, but no one would receive him except for the Banū Rawāḥah b. Sa‘d from the Banū ‘Abs, who said, “We will fight at your side, if you wish,” because of an act of favor al-Nu‘mān had shown to them over the matter of Marwān al-Qa‘raẓ. However, he replied, “I don’t want to bring about your destruction, for you don’t have the strength to prevail over Kisrā.”\textsuperscript{848} So he traveled onward until he encamped secretly at Dhū Qār amongst the Banū Shaybān. Here he met Ḥāni‘ b. Mas‘ūd b. ‘Āmir b. ‘Amr b. Abī Rabī‘ah b. Dhuḥl b. Shaybān, who was a mighty chief. At that time, the sheikhly rule in Rabī‘ah was among the house of Dhū al-Jaddayn, held by Qays b. Mas‘ūd b. Qays b. Khālid b. Dhī al-Jaddayn.\textsuperscript{849} Kisrā had made a grant to \textsuperscript{847} The tribe of Ṭayyi‘i, whose ancient pasture grounds were in northern Najd, as the connection of their name with the two mountains there shows (see n. 846 above), were accounted Yemeni in genealogy. Al-Nu‘mān’s marriage with two Ṭā‘ī wives suggests that the tribe had links with the Lakhmids, but these were not strong enough to offset the need to keep up good relations with the Sāsānids, and it was a man of Ṭayyi‘i, Iyās b. Qabīsah, whom Khusrō appointed after al-Nu‘mān’s death as the first, and last, non-Lakhmid governor in al-Ḥīrah and the former Lakhmid lands and who commanded the forces of the Persians and their Arab allies at Dhū Qār (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1017, p. 341 above). Christianity seems to have acquired some hold among the Ṭayyi‘i in pre-Islamic times, presumably among those of the tribe who frequented the fringes of Iraq, and Iyās was a Christian. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 249–57, II, 57–61, 176; \textit{EP}, s.v. Ṭayyi‘i [Irfan Shahid]. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 329 n. 2, al-Nu‘mān’s own adoption of Christianity—the first of his line to do so—was nominal enough for him to remain polygamous and to take at least two wives.

\textsuperscript{848} The ‘Abs were a component of the great North Arab group of Ghaṭafān, part of Qays ‘Aylan, with the Banū Rawāḥah coming in the tribal \textit{sīsilat al-nasab} five generations after ‘Abs himself. Their pasture grounds lay between the Jabal Shammar and northern Hijāz, hence just beyond those of Ṭayyi‘i. The “matter of Marwān al-Qa‘raẓ” involved al-Nu‘mān’s securing this man’s release from al-Nu‘mān’s uncle and the previous ruler in al-Ḥīrah Amr b. al-Mundhir or b. Hind, and the affair is referred to in the poetry of Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā [who was born and reared among the Banū ‘Abdallāh of Ghaṭafān], as is the magnanimous reception of the fugitive Lakhmid by the Banū Rawāḥah b. Sa‘d. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 92, 132–33, 136, II, 20–21, 135–36; \textit{EP}, s.v. Ghaṭafān [J. W. Fück]; and on al-Nu‘mān’s flight and attempts to secure \textit{jīwār} or tribal protection, see Rothstein, \textit{Lahmiden}, 117–18.

\textsuperscript{849} Dhū al-Jaddayn were one of the leading families of Bakr [see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 144, II, 24), from the Hammām b. Murrah, a dominant branch of the Shaybān. Equally influential with Qays was his son, the poet and warrior Bistām. See \textit{EP}, s.v. Bistām b. Kays [M. J. Kister].
Qays b. Mas'ūd of al-Ubullah, hence al-Nu'mān was fearful of entrusting his family and dependents to him because of that fact, whereas, he knew that Hāni' would protect him as he would his own life.

Al-Nu'mān then (i.e., after leaving his family and dependents with Hāni') proceeded toward Kisra's court. On the stone bridge of Sābāt he met Zayd b. 'Adī, who said to him, "Save yourself, [if you can,] O Little Nu'mān [Nu'aym]!" Al-Nu'mān replied, "You have done this, O Zayd, but by God, if I manage to survive, I shall do with you what I did with your father!" Zayd told him, "Go on, Little Nu'mān, for by God, I have prepared for you at Kisra's court bonds to hobble your feet which even a high-spirited colt couldn't break!" When the news of his arrival at court reached Kisra, the latter sent guards to him who put him in fetters, and he consigned him to Khāniqīn. There he remained in gaol until an outbreak

---

850. Al-Ubullah [< Greek Apologos] lay on the right bank of the Euphrates-Tigris estuary, at the mouth of a canal of the same name, the Nahr al-Ubullah. The town existed in Sāsānid times and possibly earlier, and in the later Sāsānid period, at least, came normally within the dominions of the Lakhmids. With the advent of Islam, al-Ubullah was to some extent eclipsed by the mist of al-Baṣra, founded further inland, but it continued to be a port of major significance for trade with the Arabian Sea and Indian Ocean shores all through mediaeval Islamic times until the Mongol invasions. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 76–78; Le Strange, Lands, 47–48; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 62–64; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 161–62; EIP, s.v. al-Ubullah (J. H. Kramers).

852. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 331 n. 2, another brother of Zayd's, 'Amr (not 'Ammār) b. 'Adī b. Zayd, acted as adviser on Arab affairs and translator for Khusrav Abarwēz, and fought at Dhū Qār on the Persian side, where he was killed. See Aghānī2, XXIV, 61–62, 73–74. The family of 'Adī b. Zayd continued to be of significance in al-Hi'rāt until well into 'Abbāsid times, when al-Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 309, tr. 141, describes them in his own time [late third/ninth century] as among the upper social strata there ('ilyat ahl al-Ḥi'rāh) and still firmly attached to their Christian faith.

853. This town lay to the northeast of Ctesiphon and the later Baghdad on the highway through Jibāl to al-Rayy and Khurāsān; at the present day, it comes just within the borders of Iraq. The early Islamic geographers praise a fine, brick-built bridge there, spanning the Hulwān river, an affluent of the Diyālā, and this apparently dated back to the town's pre-Islamic existence. The fact that al-Nu'mān was imprisoned there suggests the presence there of a Sāsānid fortress also. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 340–41; Le Strange, Lands, 62–63; Schwarz, Iran, 687–89; Barthold, of plague occurred and he died in prison. People think that he died at Sābāt on account of a verse by al-A'şā,

It happened thus, and he was not able to save his master (i.e., al-Nu'mān, the master of the noble steed addressed in the preceding verses) from death at Sābāt, dying while he was incarcerated.854

In fact, he died at Khānīqīn, just a short while before the coming of Islam. Soon afterward, God sent His prophet; al-Nu'mān's fate was the cause of the battle of Dhū Qār.855

There was related to me a narrative going back to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā—Abū al-Mukhtār Fīrās b. Khindīf and a number of the learned scholars of the Arabs whom Abū 'Ubaydah expressly named, as follows:856 When al-Nu'mān killed 'Adī, the latter's brother and son hatched a plot against al-Nu'mān at Kīsrā's court, and falsified a letter sent by al-Nu'mān to Kīsrā exculpating himself with expressions that roused Kīsrā's anger. Hence he ordered al-Nu'mān to be killed. When al-Nu'mān had become fearful of Kīsrā, he had deposited his coat of mail, his valuables, and other arms with Hānī' b. Mas'ūd b. 'Āmīr al-Khāṣīb b. 'Amīr al-Muṣdālīf b. Abī Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān b. Tha'llabah; this was because al-Nu'mān had given him two of his daughters in marriage. Abū 'Ubaydah added, however, that "Other Historical Geography, 199, 202; EP, s.v. Khānīqīn [P. Schwarz]. In his Iran im Mittelalter, 688 n. 1, Schwarz details the information of the Arabic sources on al-Nu'mān's mode of death: either from plague or through being trampled by elephants.

855. This could be considered as true in an indirect way, in that the end of the Lakhmids does seem to have facilitated increased depredations by Bedouin tribes like the Bakr on the now less strongly defended desert fringes of Iraq. Whether Khusraw had any serious reason for thinking that al-Nu'mān was aiming at a policy more independent of his Persian overlord is impossible now to determine. See Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 607–608.

Other accounts in the Arabic sources of al-Nu'mān's fall from favor and his consequent fate are given in al-Ya’qūbī, Ta’rikh, I, 245–46; al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūj, III, 205–10 = §§ 1065–70; Ḥamzah al-İsfahānī, Ta’rikh, 94–95 [al-Dīnawārī, on the other hand, takes very little account of the Lakhmids]. See also Nöldeke, trans. 332 n. 1.

856. This is now the continuation of the riwāyah from Abū 'Ubaydah begun by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1016, p. 339 above.
authorities state that Hāni’ b. Mas’ūd was no longer alive at the time of this happening; the person in question was Hāni’ b. Qabiṣah b. Hāni’ b. Mas’ūd, and I consider this to be correct."\[359\]

After Kisrā had had al-Nu’mān killed, he appointed Iyās b. Qabiṣah al-Ṭā’ī as governor over al-Ḥirah and the other former territories of al-Nu’mān.\[858\] Abū ‘Ubaydah related: When Kisrā had fled from Bahram [Chūbīn], he passed by Iyās b. Qabiṣah, and the latter gave him a horse and slaughtered a camel for him; in this way, Kisrā showed his gratitude.\[859\] Kisrā sent a message to Iyās enquiring where al-Nu’mān’s deposited possessions were. Iyās replied that al-Nu’mān had found a safe refuge for them among the Bakr b. Wā’il. So Kisrā ordered Iyās to get possession of what al-Nu’mān had left behind and to forward that to him. Iyās sent a message to Hāni’, “Send to me the coats of mail and other items al-Nu’mān entrusted to you” (the lowest estimate of these mailed coats was four hundred, and the highest was eight hundred). But Hāni’ refused to hand over what he had engaged to protect.\[860\]

He related: When Hāni’ withheld these, Kisrā was filled with anger and gave out that he would extirpate the Bakr b. Wā’il. At that moment, he had at his court al-Nu’mān b. Zur’ah al-Ṭaghlibi, \[857\] Hāni’ b. Qabiṣah b. Mas’ūd al-Shaybānī and Iyās b. Qabiṣah al-Ṭā’ī, or his son Farwah b. Iyās—Iyās being at this point the Persian ruler’s viceroy in al-Ḥirah—are mentioned in al-Baladhuri, Futnūh, 243, as yielding up the city in 12/633 to Khalid b. al-Walid’s forces on the basis of a peace treaty, with the provision that the Hīrān leaders were now to act as spies for the Arabs against the Persians.

---

\[858\] Iyās, noted above as involved (unless his son Farwah is meant) in the surrender of al-Ḥirah to the Arabs, was the son of Khusraw’s adviser Qabiṣah, the tribe of Ṭayyi’ having links with the Sāṣānīd ruling house (see n. 847 above). He was thus an appropriate person to appoint as governor in al-Ḥirah. However, at his side Khusraw placed his commander Nakhtirjan (on this name, see n. 377 above), who was later to play an eminent role in the defense of al-Madā’in against the Arabs (see al-Ṭabari, I, 2419-22, etc., below), as financial controller and tribute collector. Iyās was to govern in al-Ḥirah from 600 to 611. See Rothstein, Lahmiden, 110, 116, 120 and n. 1.

\[859\] As Nöldke, trans. 333 n. 2, commented, this gratitude was rather belated. Al-Mas’ūdī, Murtūf, II, 216-17, has different details on the fugitive Khusraw’s desperate search for a mount, including the detail that al-Nu’mān refused to give the king his own celebrated horse al-Yāḥmūm.

\[860\] This refusal to hand over valuable war material is confirmed by some verses of al-A’shā in Abū al-Faraj al-Īṣfahānī, Aghāni³, XXIV, 79.
who was eager for the destruction of the Bakr b. Wā'il.\footnote{The two tribes of Bakr and Taghlib, although forming the major part of Rabi'ah, were at odds with each other for much of the sixth century. See \textit{EI}², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il [W. Caskel].} Al-Nu'mān said to Kisrā, “O best of rulers, shall I show you how Bakr might be attacked unawares?” Kisrā replied, “Yes!” Al-Nu'mān said, “Leave them alone, so that they can go to their summer encampments, for if they do take up these summer quarters they will alight at one of their watering places called Dhū Qār just as a moth falls into a fire, and then you can fall upon them exactly as you wish. I myself can take charge of this and get rid of them for you.” Al-Nu'mān’s phrase “they will alight just like a moth falling into a fire” was translated for Kisrā, and he accordingly left them alone for the time being.

But then when the Bakr b. Wā'il migrated to their summer quarters, they went along and encamped at the bend of Dhū Qār, one night’s journey away from Dhū Qār itself. Kisrā sent al-Nu'mān b. Zur‘ah to them with the message that they were to chose one of three courses of action [literally, “aims, targets”]. Al-Nu'mān encamped at Ḥānī’is and told him, “I am the king’s envoy to you. I offer you three courses of action. Either you submit yourselves, and the king will make a decision concerning you however he pleases; or you remove yourselves from the land; or be apprised of the imminence of war.”\footnote{Echoing Qur‘ān, II, 279, \textit{fa’-dhann bi-llārbin min Allāh wa-rasālihi.}} They took counsel together, and left the decision to Ḥānẓalah b. Tha’labah b. Sayyār al-‘Ijli, whose advice they regarded as auspicious.\footnote{The \textit{sayyid} Ḥānẓalah b. Tha’labah is described in \textit{Aghānī}³, XXIV, 67, as bald headed, large bellied and with a reddish-brown skin, which Nöldke, trans. 334 n. 3, regarded as probably an authentic description, since it deviates radically from the usual ideal of the spare desert warrior with long locks of hair.} Ḥānẓalah told them, “I can’t see any other course but fighting, for if you place yourself in his hands, you will be killed and your children enslaved. If you flee, you will die of thirst, and the Tamīm will come upon you and put you to death. So apprise the king of imminent war.”

The king sent messages to Iyās, to al-Hārmoraz al-Tustārī, whose fortress was at al-Quṭqṭānah, and to Jalābzīn,\footnote{This rendering of the Persian commander’s name approaches more closely to the Zalabzan of the Byzantine Greek historians [see n. 739 above] than the} who held the fortress at Bāriq. Kīsrā further wrote to [the above-mentioned] Qays b. Masʿūd b. Qays b. Khalīd b. Dhib al-Jaddayn, whom Kīsrā had appointed over the frontier zone [al-ṭaff] of Safawān, with instructions to meet up with Iyās, and when they were all assembled, Iyās was to be their leader. The Persians brought along troops and elephants on which were mounted cavalymen. At this time, the Prophet had already begun his mission and the authority of the Persians had become weak. The Prophet said, "Today the Arabs have received satisfaction from the Persians." Note was taken of that day, and behold, it was the day of the battle.

When the armies of the Persians and their allies drew near, Qays b. Masʿūd slipped away by night and went to Hānī. He told him, "Give your troops al-Nuʿmān [b. al-Mundhir]'s weapons in order thereby to increase the troops' strength. If they should perish, they will merely share the fate of those who bore them [originally], and you will have acted with all prudence and resolution; and if they are victorious, they will give them back to you." Hānī did that, and divided out the mailed coats and weapons among the strongest and stoutest of his troops. When the [Persian] army drew near to the Bakr, Hānī shouted to the latter, "O men of the Bakr tribe! You won't be able to withstand Kīsrā's troops and their Arab allies, so gallop back to the desert!" The tribesmen rushed headlong to do that, but Ḥanẓalah b. Thaʿlabah b. Sayyār sprang up and said to Hānī, "You admittedly want us to flee to safety, but you are thereby increasing the likelihood of your consigning us to destruction!" Thus he persuaded the tribesmen to go back, and he cut through the leather straps of the litters [on the camels] so that the Khunābizin of the Naḏīd jarīr wa-al-Parazdaq, II, 640, 643, 644; see Addenda et emendanda, p. cxcv.

865. The three places mentioned here were points along the zone of frontier posts and fortresses to the west of the middle and lower Euphrates. See Yaqūt, Buldān, I, 319–20, III, 225, IV, 374 [al-Qutqūṭānāh as the place of al-Nuʿmān's imprisonment, but this is less likely than the fortress at Khāniqān mentioned by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1028, p. 357 above]; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 151, 153.

866. As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 336 n. 1, Qays b. Masʿūd was subsequently imprisoned by Khusraw in Sābāt on the grounds that he had not prevented Bedouin incursions across the frontier zone of al-Ṭaff, confirmed by poetry allegedly composed by Qays himself in Abū al-Ṭaʿrij al-Īṣfahānī, Aghāzība, XXIV, 57–59. Abū Ḥasydāh's information here does confirm that Qays may have had a secret understanding with his fellow members of Bakr. However, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1035, p. 367 below, al-ʿAʾshā satirizes Qays for cowardice and flight in battle.
Bakr would not be able to take their womenfolk with them if they were to flee. He therefore acquired the name of “the one who cuts the thongs” (muqattî’ al-wudûn), wudûn being the straps securing the saddles and litters, or else “the one who cuts the belly girths” (muqattî’ al-bûtn), butn being the straps securing the load-bearing frameworks on draught camels (al-aqtâb).\footnote{This incident appears also in Aghānî³, XXIV, 68–71.} Hānẓalah also erected a tent for himself in the depression of Dhū Ḍarb and took an oath that he would not flee unless the tent itself fled. Some of them (i.e., the Bakr) went forward, but the greater part of them went back and spent half a month at a watering place getting water for themselves [and their herds].

The Persians came upon them and fought with them at the bend [of Dhū Ḍarb]. The Persians suffered from thirst, hence they fled, without making a stand and being hard pressed, back to al-Jubâbah,\footnote{Al-Jubâbah (thus sing.) is merely noted by Yaqūt, Buldân, II, 98, as a place near Dhū Ḍarb, and a watering place of the Abû Bakr b. Kilâb.} with the Bakr and the ’Ijl, the foremost of the Bakr, pursuing them. The ’Ijl were in the forefront and fought in an exemplary fashion on that day. The Persian troops came together [at first] in a compact mass, so that people said, “The ’Ijl are finished!” Then [the rest of] the Bakr rallied to the attack and found the ’Ijl standing fast and fighting back. One of their women recited:

\begin{quote}
If the uncircumcised ones (al-ghuzal) gain the victory, they will ravish us (literally, “place [their penises] inside us”); onwards, may your lives be ransoms for yourselves, O Banū ’Ijl!
\end{quote}

She also said, urging on the combattants:

\begin{quote}
If you put the enemy to flight, we shall embrace [you] and spread out soft rugs [for you].

But if you flee, we shall avoid [you], showing no tender affection!\footnote{These three verses of the ’Ijl woman figure in the account of Dhū Ḍarb in the Naqā‘id Jarîr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 641, while the second and third verses, with a slight variant, are attributed in Ibn Hishâm, Sirât al-nâbî, ed., Wüstenfeld, 562 – ed. al-Saqqa et al., III, 72, tr. 374, to Hind bt. ’Utba when she urged on Quraysh against the Muslims at the battle of Uḥud, in the year 3/625.} \end{quote}
They fought with the Persians at al-Jubābāt for a whole day. Then the Persians suffered thirst and made toward the depression of Dhū Qār. The [tribe of] Iyād, who were auxiliary troops against the Bakr with Iyās b. Qabīṣah,870 secretly sent a message to the Bakr: “Which is more attractive to you, that we should arise and steal away under cover of night, or stay here and take to flight when you encounter the enemy?” They replied, “Nay, stand fast, and then, when the enemy engage in battle, take to flight with them.” He related: Bakr b. Wā'il fell upon the enemy next morning, with their womenfolk (al-zu'un, literally, "those mounted on camels in litters") standing nearby, inciting the men to fight. Yazīd b. Ḥimār al-Sakūnī, a confederate of the Banū Shaybān, said, “O Banū Shaybān, follow my leadership and let me make an ambush against the enemy.” They did that, and made Yazīd b. Ḥimār their leader. Then they concealed themselves in an ambush at a place near Dhū Qār called al-Jubb,871 and showed themselves stout warriors there. Commanding Iyās b. Qabīṣah’s right wing was al-Hāmarz, and over his left wing was al-Jalābzīn; commanding the right wing of Hāni' b. Qabīṣah, the leader of the Bakr, was Yazīd b. Mus'hīr al-Shaybānī, and over his left was Ḥanẓalāḥ b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār al-'Ijli. The people began to urge on their fellows and to compose rajaz verses [to encourage them]. Ḥanẓalāḥ b. Tha'labah recited:

Your hosts have already become a compact mass, so fight fiercely! What excuse shall I have, since I am strongly armed and robust?872

The bow has a thick string, like the foreleg of a young camel or stronger.

870. The Iyād were a North Arab tribe, whose eponymous forebear was said by the genealogists to be a son of Nizār b. Ma'add and a brother of Rabī'ah and Muḍar. Some Iyād settled at al-Ḥirah and became Christians; others remained nomadic, and at the end of the sixth century and beginning of the seventh century were among the tribes in the service of the Sāsānids as frontier auxiliaries until their defection from the Persian side as narrated below. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Casket-Strenziok, Jamhurat al-nasab, I, Tables 174–75, II, 29–30, 359–60; EP, s.v. Iyād [J. W. Fück]. For Iyās b. Qabīṣah, see above nn. 810, 858.

871. Literally, “depression, hollow.”

The celebrated deeds of my people have become clear. Indeed, there is no escape from death.

Here is 'Umayr, whose tribe\textsuperscript{873} rushes impetuously forward in battle,\textsuperscript{874} with none able to repel it, Until his reddish-colored horse becomes like a dark-brown one (i.e., with the blood of battle); they have cleared the way, O Banū Shaybān, and stood firm on their own!\textsuperscript{875}

Myself, my father and my grandfather I give as your ransom!

Ḥanẓalāh further recited,

O my people, rejoice in yourselves at fighting! [This is] the most suitable of days for putting the Persians to flight!\textsuperscript{876}

Yazīd b. al-Mukassir b. Ḥanẓalāh b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār recited:

The one of you who flees abandons his wives and the alien under his protection, and flees also from his boon companion.

I am the son of Sayyār, with his toughness and endurance (literally, "hanging on to his bit"); indeed, the sandal thongs have been cut from his own hide.

All men grow in the way of their forefathers, whether nurtured from defective blood or of pure stock.\textsuperscript{877}

Firās related: Then they handed over the command, after Hānī,\textsuperscript{878} to Ḥanẓalāh. He went along to his daughter Māriyah, who was the mother of ten sons, one of these being Jābir b. Abjar,\textsuperscript{879} and cut through the leather straps of her litter so that she \textsuperscript{873} The Cairo text, II, 209, has the reading taḥtahu for ḥayyuḥu, followed in the text of the \textit{Naqāʾīd Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq}.

\textsuperscript{874} Following the emendation in \textit{Addenda et emendanda}, p. DXCV, taqdumatan.

\textsuperscript{875} Following, with the text of the \textit{Naqāʾīd}, the probable emendations to the second hemistich given in \textit{Addenda et emendanda}, loc. cit., with statements (khallaw . . . wa-stabaddi) rather than imperative verbs and commands.

\textsuperscript{876} These verses of Ḥanẓalāh figure in the \textit{Naqāʾīd}, II, 642.

\textsuperscript{877} These verses are in the \textit{Naqāʾīd}, II, 643, with the poet's name as Yazīd al-Mukassir b. Ḥanẓalāh, i.e., the son, not the grandson, of the previously cited poet.

\textsuperscript{878} That is, because, as recorded by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1031, p. 361 above, Hānī had left the field.

\textsuperscript{879} Nöldeke noted, trans. 139 n. 3, that the Hajjar b. Abjar b. Jābir b. Bujayr al-ʾIjli mentioned in the historical sources was probably Jābir's brother. This Hajjar fell to the ground, and he did the same with the straps of the other women so that they all fell to the ground. The daughter of al-Qarin, the woman of Shaybân, cried out when the women fell to the ground,

Woe to you, O Banû Shaybân, rank upon rank! If you are put to flight, the uncircumcised ones (al-qulaq) will ravish us (literally, "will plunge into us")!

Seven hundred of the Banû Shaybân cut the arms of the sleeves of their garments from the shoulder pieces so that their arms would be freer for wielding their sword, and then they engaged the enemy fiercely in battle. He related: Al-Hâmarz cried out [in Persian], "Man to man!" (mard u mard). Burd b. Hârithah al-Yashkurî exclaims, "What is he saying?" They told him, "He is issuing a summons to single combat, man to man." He replied, "By your father! He has spoken justly!" Burd advanced against him and slew him. Surayd b. Abî Kählîc recited:

Little Burd (Burayd) is one of us, [who proved himself in battle] when he went out against your hordes, when you did not want to let him draw near to the Marzbân with the bracelets on his arm.

was prominent in fighting the Muslims during the Riddah wars in al-Bahrâyin during Abû Bakr's caliphate, but apparently became a Muslim under 'Umar, especially as Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqât, VI, 161 (but not, e.g., Ibn al-Athîr, Usd al-ghâbah), devotes a notice to him since, after conversion, he could technically be considered as a Companion of the Prophet, cf. also Donner, "The Bakr b. Wa'il Tribes and Politics in Northeastern Arabia on the Eve of Islam," 31-32. His father Abjar seems, however, to have remained Christian until his death toward the end of 'Ali's reign. See al-Tabârî, I, 3460, and Hawting, The History of al-Tabârî, an Annotated Translation, XVII, The First Civil War, 217 and n. 858. Noldeke further noted the antiquity of the name Abjar/Abgar among the Arabs, going back to the kings of Edessa, among whom some ten of that name are known. See Segal, Edessa, 'The Blessed City,' index s.vv. Abgar I, etc.

880. The Banû Yashkur were a tribe of Bakr, with much of the tribe living as sedentaries in al-Yamâmah. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 162, II, 26, 592.

882. The parallel verse in the Naq'id, II, 643, has for this name "Yazid," but the text shortly afterward mentions Burayd as a variant for Yazid.

883. Abû al-Faraj al-Iṣfahâni, Aghânî, XXIV, 71, mentions that the Persian cavalrymen of al-Hâmarz rode out against the Bakr wearing arm bracelets
That is, you did not consider him [as an outstanding warrior].

Hanżalah b. Tha’labah b. Sayyār called out, “O my people, don’t just stand there facing them, or they will overwhelm you with arrows! The left wing of the Bakr, led by Hanżalah, attacked the [Persian] army’s right wing (whose commander, al-Ḥāmarz, Burd had just killed), and the right wing of the Bakr, led by Yazīd b. Mus’hīr, attacked the [Persian] army’s left wing (commanded by Jalābzīn). The concealed force under Yazīd b. Ḥīmār came up behind them from al-Jubb of Dhū Qār, and launched an attack on the enemy’s center, where Iyās b. Qabīṣah was. The Iyād turned round and fled, just as they had undertaken to do, and the Persians also fled.

Salīt said: The [Arab] captives whom we took, who were on that day in the Persian forces, related to us thus, saying: When the two sides clashed, Bakr took to flight, so we said, ‘They are making for the watering place.’ But when they crossed the wadi and emerged from the bed of its stream onto the other side, we said, ‘This is flight.’ This happened in the midday heat of a day in the midst of summer. A detachment of the Ḥīl approached, tightly packed like a bundle of reeds, with no gaps in between; they did not offer impediment to any fugitives [i.e., from the other branches of the Bakr] and they did not mingle with others of the enemy. Then they urged each other on to the attack, advanced in a mass and hurled themselves frontally at the enemy. There was nothing more to be done; they had made the enemy yield, and these last turned and fled. They slew the Persians and those with them from the depression of Dhū Qār as far as al-Rāḥidah. Fīrās related: I was further informed that they pursued the Persians closely, not looking for plunder or anything else, until they met up with each other at Adam, a place near Dhū Qār. There were found to be thirty riders from the Banū Ḥīl and sixty from the rest of the Bakr. They killed Jalābzīn, slain by the hand of Hanżalah b. Tha’labah. Maymūn b. Qays [i.e., al-A'shā] recited the poem, praising the Banū Shaybān in particular:

I would give as a ransom for the Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān my she-camel and its rider [i.e., myself] on the day of the encounter, but this would be too little.887

They combatted fiercely the vanguard of al-Hāmarz at the bend, the bend of Qurāqir, until he turned and fled.

Qays [b. Mas'ād] escaped from our group, and I commented, "Perhaps, if he were wearing sandals there, he threw them off" [i.e., in order to escape more easily].

This shows that Qays was in fact present at Dhū Qār.

Bukayr, the deaf one [al-aṣāmm] of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ḫubād,888 eulogised the Banū Shaybān thus:

[O serving girl,] if you pour out wine for those who are wont to enjoy it [or, "deserve it"], then pour it out as an act of honor for the sons of Hammām,

And for all of the Abū Rabī‘ah and the Muḥallim,889 who attained the foremost place on the most noble of battle days.

They attacked the Free Ones [Banū al-Alīrār]890 on the day when they encountered them in battle, with Mashrafi swords891 on the place where the skull rests firmly.

Arabs numbering three thousand and a force of two thousand Persians, from those who wear cloths over their mouths [banī al-faddām].892

887. Following the reading wa-qallati of al-A'shā, Diwan, 179, no. 40 v. 1; Nağā'id, II, 644; Aghānī3, XXIV, 78; and Addenda et emendanda, p. dxcv, I do not see how Nöldeke, trans. 342, got his rendering "[geb' ich . . . ] und meinen Renner" from wa-fullati.

888. Al-Ḥārith b. Ḫubād b. Ḍubay'ah were a clan of the important Tha'labah branch of Bakr. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 155, II, 25, 314.

889. Muḥallim b. Dhuhl were a clan of Shaybān. See Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 142, II, 421.

890. See for these, n. 604 above.

891. Clearly a superior kind of sword. The lexica give various explanations for the term, including one connecting it with the mashārif al-Šām, "the highlands of Syria," possibly the Hawrān massif, which would be near the place of origin of the later, famed swords of Damascus. See Lane, Lexicon, 1539a.

892. Nöldeke, trans. 343 n. 2, noted the reference here to the pandām,
The son of Qays made a charge, and the fame of it for him has traveled as far as the peoples of Iraq and Syria, [That is,] 'Amr, and 'Amr is not decrepit with age or weak minded among them (i.e., his people of Qays), nor inexperienced and a mere youth.893

Since al-A'shā and al-Asāmm praised the Banū Shaybān specifically, the Lahāzim894 grew angry, and Abū Kalbah, one of the Banū Qays,895 reproached those two poets strongly for this:

May you be mutilated, O two poets of a people of exalted fame! May your noses be cut off with a saw!
I mean the deaf one [al-asāmm] and our weak-sighted one [a'shānā] who, when they both come together, do not find help for [defective] hearing from seeing.
If it had not been for the riders of the Lahāzim, who are not feeble and defenseless, they would not have been able to spend the summer [any longer] at Dhū Qār.
We came upon them from their left side, just as those going to water [their beasts] become intermingled with those returning from the water (i.e troops traveling in opposite directions, with the enemy fleeing and ourselves wheeling round and returning to the battle field).896

\[1037\]

\[

893. These verses also in Naqā'id, II, 644–45; Aghānī, XXIV, 77–78.
894. The Lahāzim were a grouping of Bakri tribes, defined in the Umayyad al-Baṣra of some eighty years later than this time as the Qays b. Tha'labah and their confederates, the 'Anazah, and the Taymallāt b. Tha'labah and their confederates, the 'Ijl. See al-Tabarī, II, 448, tr. Hawting, The History of al-Tabari, an Annotated Translation, XX, The Collapse of Sufyānid Authority and the Coming of the Marwānids, 25–26; cf. Ibn al-Kalbi-Caskell-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, II, 27. The term lahāzim is said by the lexicographers to be the plural of lihzimah, “mastoid bone, hinge of the jawbone with the skull,” the idea of hardness being transferred to the solidity of the tribal alliance. See Glossarium, p. cdlxxiii; Ullmann, WbKAS, II, Letter làm, Pt. 2, 1516–19; EI* s.v. Taimallāt b. Tha'labah (G. Levi Della Vida).
896. Naqā'id, II, 645, in part quoted, but with additional verses, in Aghānī, XXIV, 77.
[The Last Sasanid Kings]

Abū 'Amr b. al-'Alā' said: When Abū Kalbah's words reached al-A’shā, he commented, "He has spoken truly," and recited verses in extenuation of himself, some of which are:

When a deaf person is linked through a connection with a weak-sighted one, they both wander around distractedly, lost and in distress.
For I am not able to see what he can see, while he is never able to hear my reply.\(^{897}\)

Al-A’shā recited concerning the day of battle,
There came to us from the Free Ones (Banū al-Ahrār) a word that was not conformable.
They wanted to hack down the tree of our nobility, but we were defending ourselves against serious events.\(^{898}\)

He also recited to Qays b. Mas’ūd, O Qays b. Mas’ūd b. Qays b. Khālid, you are a man in whose youthful vigor the whole of Wā’il\(^{899}\) places its hopes!
Are you combining in a single year both raiding and journeying abroad? Would that the midwives had drowned Qays [at his birth]!\(^{900}\)

Al-A’shā of the Banū Rabī’ah said,\(^{901}\)
We stood our ground firmly on the morning of Dhū Qār, when [the enemy] tribes were present there in swarms, having come together to give aid.
They had brought on that occasion a dark-colored [army], an intimidatory host, with closely compacted squadrons of riders, a crushing force,

---

897. al-A’šā, Diwān, 206, no. 57 vv. 1–2; Naqā’id, II, 645.
898. Diwān, 204, no. 56, vv. 5–6; Naqā’id, II, 645, with al-ḥakamā for al-khuṭamā at the end of the second verse.
899. That is, Wā’il b. Jadīlāh b. Asād b. Rabī’ah, from whom sprang the two great tribes of Bakr and Taghlīb. See EP, s.v. Rabī’a and Muḍar (H. Kindermann).
900. Diwān, 128, no. 26 vv. 1–2; Naqā’id, II, 645–46.
901. That is, A’shā Banī Abī Rabī’ah or A’shā Shaybān, ‘Abdallāh b. Khārijah, another of the many poets with this sobriquet, numbered at seventeen by the Arabic literary biographers. This al-A’shā was a poet of al-Kūfah and a staunch adherent of the Marwānids, dying ca. 100/718–19. See Nöldeke, trans. 344 n. 6; EP, s.v. al-A’šā (ed.).
For a hateful day of battle, until the moment when the shades of its blackness fell away from us, revealing us as warriors with unsheathed swords.

They thereupon turned their backs on us totally, and we only had to ward off Nu'mān b. Zur'ah.903

And we drove away the threatening rain-cloud (ārid) of the free ones as if going to water, just as the sand grouse (qatā) alight for water at a desert pool with exiguous water.904

Mention of Those Vassal Rulers Set over the Desert Frontier of the Arabs at al-Ḥirah as Appointees of the Monarchs of Persia, after ‘Amr b. Hind

We have already mentioned previously those members of the house of Naṣr b. Rabī‘ah who held this power as vassal rulers on behalf of the monarchs of Persia up to the time of ‘Amr b. Hind’s death, and the durations of their respective periods of office as vassal rulers. after ‘Amr b. Hind up to the time when al-Nu‘mān b. al-Mundhir held power.905

The person who exercised this office after ‘Amr b. Hind was his [full] brother Qābūs b. al-Mundhir,906 whose mother was likewise Hind b. al-Ḥarīth b. ‘Amr; he held power for four years, of which eight months fell in the reign of Anūsharwān and three years and four months in the reign of the latter’s son Hurmuz.907 After 902. *akta‘imā, also translatable “as if they were completely mutilated,” as by Nöldeke, trans. 345.

---

903. That is, the Taghlibi chief and enemy of the Bakr, who at Khusrwān’s court advised the course of action that led to the Yawm Dīh Qār; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1030, pp. 359–60 above. According to Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghāni, XXIV, 72–73, he escaped from the field of Dhū Qār.

904. Dīwān, 281 no. 16 vv. 1–5.

906. The appearance of this purely Persian name, an Arabized form of Kāwūs (< Avestan Kawi-Usan, see Nöldeke, 345 n. 4; Justi, Namenbuch, 334–46; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, nos. 208, 210, 323), among the Lakhmids, is an indication of the strength of Persian cultural influence within the dynasty. See further on this, Bosworth, “Iran and the Arabs before Islam,” 609ff.

907. On this count, Qābūs would have reigned from 578 or 579 to 582 or 583, since Khusrwān Anūsharwān died in 579, but we know that he was ruling a decade or so before then, since he was defeated by the Jafnid/Ghassānīd al-Mundhir b. al-
Qābūs b. al-Mundhir there came to power al-Suhrab,\(^{908}\) then after him the father of al-Nu'mān, al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir, who held power for four years,\(^{909}\) then after him, al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir, Abū Qābūs, for twenty-two years, of which seven years and eight months fell in the reign of Hurmuz, son of Anūsharwān, and fourteen years and four months in the reign of Kisrā Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz.\(^{910}\) Then there held power Iyās b. Qabi ah al-Ta'i, together with al-Nakhirajan, for nine years in the reign of Kīsrā, son Hārith on Ascension Day 570. His four years' reign must have been from 569 or 570 to 573 or 574, i.e., entirely within Anūsharwān's reign, as confirmed by Ḥamzah al-Īsfahānī, Ta'rikh, 94. See Nöldeke, trans. 345 n. 1; Rothstein, Lahmiden, 72, 102–106. Rothstein, op. cit., 103, pointed out that what we know of Qābūs's military activities does not confirm Ḥamzah's allegation that he was a weak and ineffectual ruler, and he believed that the contemptuous nickname given to Qābūs of Qaynat al-'Urus (read thus for Ḥamzah's Fitnat al-'Urus), "slavegirl who looks after the bride's dwelling and wedding outfit," stemmed from some satirical poetry aimed at him.

908. As Nöldeke said, trans. 340 n. 1, this man with so typical a Persian name can hardly have been a Lakhmid (despite what has been said in n. 906 above about Persian cultural influence within the Lakhmid house, the name of Suhrab is totally unattested among them) but must have been a Persian official sent out by Anūsharwān during an interregnum between Qābūs's death and the eventual accession of al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III. According to Ḥamzah al-Īsfahānī, Ta'rikh, 94, this official (whose name is corruptly written here as F.y.sh.h.r.t) administered al-Hīrah for one year only. See Rothstein, Lahmiden, 106–107.

909. Al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III (also a full brother of 'Amr and Qābūs, since according to Nöldeke, trans. 346 n. 2, a poet cited in the Hamdah of Abū Tammām addresses him as "... b. Hind") must in fact have reigned rather more than four years, from ca. 574 to 580. Nöldeke mentioned, 346 n. 1, the apparent reluctance of the Christian 'Ībād of al-Hīrah to accept the pagan al-Mundhir as ruler, but Rothstein pointed out that all the Lakhmid rulers with the exception of the last one were pagans, and the fact that al-Mundhir was unable immediately to succeed his brother Qābūs must have had other causes. In the process of al-Mundhir's eventual succession to the throne in al-Hīrah, 'Adī's father Zayd b. [?] Ḥammād, Anūsharwān's adviser on Arab affairs, may have played a significant rôle. Al-Mundhir had at one point been involved in fighting with the Ġaffāris/Ġassānīds, but we have no exact details of the circumstances of his death. See Rothstein, Lahmiden, 107.

910. Al-Nu'mān III, who is also found with the kunyah of Abū al-Mundhir and whose mother was the slavegirl Salmā or Sulmā (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1017, p. 341 above), reigned 580–602 as the last of the Lakhmid kings in al-Hīrah. See Nöldeke, trans. 347 n. 1; Rothstein, Lahmiden, 107–19, 142–43. Al-Nu'mān figures frequently in the lives of the poets who frequented his court in the final florescence of Arabic culture at al-Hīrah; he was the first and last of his line to become a Nestorian Christian, however nominally, doubtless under the influence of his upbringing in the family circle of 'Adī b. Zayd. See EP, s.v. al-Nu'mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (Irfan Shahid).
of Hurmuz.911 According to what Hishām b. Muḥammad has asserted, one year and eight months from the beginning of Iyās b. Qabīṣah's tenure of power, the Prophet was sent [by God] on his mission.912 His successor Āzādhbih, son of [Ādhur] Māḥān (?), son of Mihrbundādhd, from Hamadhān, held power for seventeen years, of which fourteen years and eight months fell within the time of Kīsrā, son of Hurmuz; eight months in the time of Shirūyah, son of Kīsrā; one year and seven months in the time of Ardashīr, son of Shirūyah; and one month in the time of Būrān-dukt, daughter of Kīsrā.913 Al-Mundhir b. al-Nuṭān b. al-Mundhir then held power. He is the one whom the Arabs called al-Gharūt (“the one who deludes, deceives”) and who was killed in al-Bahrayn at the battle of Juwāṭā; he held power for eight months until Khalīd b. al-Walīd marched on al-Ḥirah and was the last survivor of the house of Naṣr b. Rabī‘ah. Their power crumbled with the collapse of the royal power in Persia.914

911. Iyās’s nine years’ of governorship was from 602–11, and this was in partnership with the Persian commander Nakhirjan (on whom, see n. 377 above). Rothstein, Lahmiden, 119–20, suggested that this arrangement could have been the prelude to the incorporation of the Lakhmid territories into the Persian empire as one of its provinces.

912. This is almost certainly too early; the Prophet’s mab’ath or mission is more probably to be placed in 610 [the call to prophethood, nubuwwah, and his nonpublic ministry], and then with ca. 613 as the date for the risālah or beginning of his public ministry in Mecca. See Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 59.

913. This means a governorship for Āzādhbih of nineteen years if he held the post till the reign of Būrān or Būrān-dukt [r. 630–31]. The reading for his father’s name is very uncertain. Marquart suggested [Ādhur] Māḥān for a completely undotted consonant skeleton, which would correspond with the name in the Byzantine Greeks historians of Adormanès, but this was regarded by the editor Noldeke as not very probable; the text could be Bān.y.ān or numerous other possibilities. See Addenda et emendanda, p. dxcv.

914. This later Lakhmid never reigned in al-Ḥirah but was raised up by the rebels of al-Bahrayn during the Riddah wars as one of their leaders, doubtless from the prestige of his ancient name and lineage. He is called in the Muslim sources al-Gharūt, “the treacherous, deceitful one,” but is said to have ruefully called himself, when captured by the Muslims, al-Maghūrūt, “the deceived one.” The accounts of his fate vary: that he was killed at the siege of Juwāṭā, the fortress of the ‘Abd al-Qays in al-Khaff [i.e., in al-Bahrayn]; that he was subsequently killed fighting for Musaylimah in al-Yamāmah; and [less probably] that he became a Muslim. See al-Baladhirī, Futūḥ, 84; al-Ṭabarī, I, 1737, tr. Ismail K. Poonawala, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, IX, The Last Years of the Prophet, 95, and I, 1959–61, tr. F. M. Donner, ibid., X, The Conquest of Arabia, 136–38; Noldeke, trans. 348 n. 1, with other information on the ultimate fate of the Lakhmid line, including that in al-Masudi, Murūj, III, 209–12 = §§ 1071–72, cf.
According to what Hishām [b. Muḥammad] has asserted, the total of the rulers of the house of Naṣr plus their deputies from the 'Ibad and the Persians, was twenty rulers. He related: The total number of years during which they held power was 522 years and eight months.

The Story Returns to the Mention of al-Marūzān, Who Governed Yemen on Behalf of Hurmuz and His Son Abarwīz, and His Successors

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muhammad, who said: Hurmuz, son of Kīrā, dismissed W.y.n (?) from Yemen and appointed in his stead al-Marūzān. The latter remained in Yemen long enough to have children born to him there and for these to grow to puberty. But then the people of one of the mountains of Yemen called al-Mašāni'\textsuperscript{919} rebelled against him and refused to hand over to him the land tax. Al-Mašāni' is a long mountain, difficult of access, with another mountain adjacent to it with a plain that is not very wide lying between them; moreover, no one can possibly conceive in his mind the idea of climbing up to it. Al-Marūzān proceeded to al-Mašāni', and when he arrived there he perceived that there was no way up to the mountain except via a single way of access which a man could defend single handed.

When al-Marūzān saw that there was no way for him to reach it, he climbed up the mountain which faced the people of al-Mašāni's fortress, and looked for the narrowest gap between it and the mountain he himself was on, with nothing but empty space stretching down below him. He realized that the only way of taking the fortress was from that point. So he ordered his troops to form themselves into two ranks and then all to shout out to him with one great shout. He spurred on his horse, it galloped on with all its force and then he hurled it forward and it jumped across the chasm, and lo and behold, he was on the top of the fortress. When the Ḥimyarites saw him and what he had done, they exclaimed, "This man is a \textsuperscript{920}y.m!"—\textsuperscript{920}y.m meaning in Ḥimyarite "devil." Then he herded them together roughly, spoke to them in Persian and ordered them to place each other in shackles. He brought Abnā' were inclined to come to terms with the Prophet, with their leader, the governor Bādhān or Bādhām (see n. 609 above) recorded as submitting and becoming a Muslim in 10/631. See EI\textsuperscript{2} s.v. Abnā' (C. E. Bosworth); EI\textsuperscript{2} Suppl. s.v. Bādhām, Bādhān (Bosworth).

\textsuperscript{919} Literally, "the constructions," in this case, fortifications. According to Nöldeke, trans. 350 n. 1, the Paris ms. of this part of al-Ṭabarī's text has a remark identifying al-Mašāni' with the mountain al-D.\textsuperscript{1} and the town of Kawkāban. The plateau and mountain area of al-Mašāni' and the Jabal Dila' (this last often mentioned by al-Hamdāni, Sifat jazirat al-\textsuperscript{2}Arab, 223, 231, 234, etc.) are in fact still known as such and lie to the west-northwest of Ṣan'ā', with the ancient town, now a provincial capital, of Kawkāban located there. See EI\textsuperscript{2} s.v. Kawkāban. 4 (A. Grohmann).

\textsuperscript{920} This mysterious word is not so far attested in South Arabian. Nöldeke, trans. 350 n. 2, cited the lexicographers al-Jawhari and Nashwān al-Ḥimyārī that it meant "a variety of serpent" and adduced Hebr. \textsuperscript{2}emāh, "something terrifying, frightful." He further suggested that there might be a connection of the word with the 'Emīm, the mythical giants of the land of Moab mentioned in Gen. xiv. 5 and Deut. ii. 10–11; but this is pure speculation, based on what is probably chance resemblance of words.
them all down from their fortress, killing one part of them and enslaving others. He wrote to Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, telling him what he had done. The king marveled at his achievement and wrote back: “Appoint as your deputy whomever you will, and come to me!”

He related: Now al-Marūzān had two sons, one of whom, called Khurrakhusrah, was very fond of Arabic and could recite poetry in it, while the other was a cavalryman who spoke Persian and lived in the fashion of a dihqān. Al-Marūzān now appointed his son Khurrakhusrah—Khurrakhusrah being the dearest to him of his sons—as his deputy over Yemen, and traveled onward until, when he was in some region of the Arab lands, he died. He was then placed in a sarcophagus and this was carried along until it was finally brought to Kisrā. The latter ordered that sarcophagus to be placed in his treasury and caused to be inscribed on it “In this sarcophagus lies so-and-so, who did such-and-such,” giving the story of what he did at the two mountains. News of Khurrakhusrah’s adoption of Arab ways (ta’arrub), his relating of Arabic poetry, and his entirely Arab education reached Kisrā, so he dismissed him and appointed as governor Bādhan, who was in fact the last of the Persian governors to be sent out to Yemen.

Kisrā became puffed up with vainglory because of the vast amount of wealth and all kinds of jewels, utensils, equipment, and horses he had accumulated. He had conquered so many of the lands of his enemies. Events all came together to aid him, and he was granted good fortune in his ventures. However, he was filled with conceit and boastfulness, and was horribly avaricious; he grudged and envied people for their wealth and possessions. He appointed a certain man from the local people (‘ilj, i.e., one of

---

921. An example of the assimilation of the Abnā’ to their local environment if, as is possible, Khurrakhusrah had an Arab mother.

922. The story of al-Marūzān’s successful attack on al-Mašānī and his eventual death and burial is given in Ibn Qutaybah, ‘Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 178–79, on the basis of the author’s readings in the “books of the Persians.”

923. The date of Bādhan’s appointment is unknown, but as noted in n. 918 above, he remained in Yemen till his conversion to Islam in 10/631.

924. Nöldeke, trans. 351 n. 1, gives a balanced assessment of Abarwēz’s character and achievements, concluding that “In sum, Khusraw II is to be considered much more a weak than a bad man.”

925. See for this term, n. 210 above.
the Nabataean population of Iraq) called Farrukhzād, son of Su-mayy,926 from a village called Khandaq927 in the tassūj of Bih-Ardashir (text, Bahurasir), to take charge of collecting the arrears taxation (al-baqāyā).928 This latter person imposed on the people all sorts of evil afflictions, ill-treated them and tyrannized them, confiscating their wealth unlawfully on the plea of extracting the arrears of land tax. He thereby rendered them disaffected, their means of life became straitened, and Kīsrā and his rule became hateful to them.

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b.
Muḥammad, who said: This Kīsrā Abarwiz had accumulated more wealth than any other monarch. His riders reached as far as Constantinople and Iṣrāqiyyah.929 He spent the winter in al-Madā'īn and the summer in the region between al-Madā'īn and Hamadhān.930 It was said that he had twelve thousand women and slave-girls, 999 elephants, and fifty thousand riding beasts comprising finely bred horses, horses of lesser breed, and mules.
He was the most avaricious of mankind regarding jewels, vessels, and the like. Another source, not Hishām, has stated that he had in his palace three thousand women with whom he had sexual relations and thousands of slave girls employed as servants, for 926. Nóldeke, trans. 352 n. 1, implied—as seems reasonable in regard to an Aramaic-speaking “Nabataean” of Iraq—that Sumayy was a Semitic name, adducing the name of the Jewish prophet S.m.y who met Zoroaster at Balkh, according to al-Ṭabarī, I, 681, tr. M. Perlmann. The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Transla-

927. Literally, “trench, ditch,” a place that cannot be identified exactly but which, if it was in the vicinity of Bih-Ardashir or Seleucia, lay to the west of al-Madā’īn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 819, p. 15 and the references in n. 58 above).

928. On this fiscal and administrative term, see n. 253 above.

929. In early Islamic geographical usage, this region (< Latin Africa, perhaps from the Afri, an indigenous people of the region, or the later Punic-Cartaginian ethnic mixture there, see EP, s.v. Ifrikiya [M. Talbi], corresponded to modern Tunisia, but is doubtless used in this context in a looser, wider sense of “North Africa” in general. These far-flung raids of Khusraw’s are, in any case, pure legend.

930. That is, in that part of the Zagros chain which now forms southern Kurdistan. As Nóldeke noted, trans 353 n. 1, it was ancient practice for rulers, from Achaemenid times onward, to spend the winter on the Mesopotamian plain but to move up to the less torrid Iranian plateau for the summer. It was actually Hamadhān which, some four or five centuries later, the Seljuq sultans preferred as their usual capital, only visiting Baghdad occasionally and normally leaving a shihnah, a military governor, there.
music making and singing, and such. He also had three thousand male servants at his hand, eighty-five hundred riding beasts on which he could travel, 760 elephants, and twelve thousand mules for conveying his baggage. He gave orders for the building of fire temples and appointed for them twelve thousand hērbads for chanting the Zoroastrian religious formulae (li-al-zamzamah).

In the eighteenth year of his reign, Kisra ordered the sums collected as land tax from his territories and its associated taxes (tawābi') and other sources of income, to be counted up. It was reported back to him that the amount of silver coinage (al-wariq) collected from the land tax and other sources of income in that year was 420 millionmithqāls [in weight], which, on the basis of seven mithqāls [in weight equaling ten dirhams], is the amount corresponding to six hundred million dirhams (i.e., silver coins). He ordered all this to be transferred to a treasury he had built at the city of Ctesiphon and had called Bahār ḥ.f.r.d (?) Khusraw, together with other sums of money he possessed, comprising coinage of Fayruz, son of Yazdajird, and Qubād, son of Fayruz, amounting to twelve thousand purses (badrah), each purse containing four thousand mithqāls in coinage, the whole... of this totaling forty-eight million mithqāls, the equivalent according to the proportion seven [to ten] of 68,571,42[8] plus a half and a third of an eighth of a dirham. In addition, there were various kinds of jewels, garments, and the like, whose grand total God alone could enumerate.

Kisrā treated people with contempt and regarded them with scorn in a manner no righteous and discerning monarch should adopt. His insolent pride and lack of respect for God reached the point that he gave orders to the man in charge of his personal guard at court, called Zādhān Fārrūkh,936 that he should kill every person held captive in any of his prisons; these persons were counted up, and their number reached thirty-six thousand. However, Zādhān Fārrūkh did not take any steps to kill them but gave instructions for a delay in implementing Kisrā's command regarding them, adducing various reasons, which he enumerated to Kisrā. Kisrā incurred for himself the hatred of the subjects of his kingdom for various reasons. First, his contemptuous treatment of them and his belittling of the great men of state. Second, his giving the barbarian (al-'ilj) Fārrukhānzdāh, son of Sumayy, power over them. Third, his command that all the prisoners should be slain. Fourth, his intention to put to death the troops returning from their defeat at the hands of Hiraql (Heraclius) and the Byzantines. Hence a group of the great men of state went to 'Aqr Bābil,937 where were Shirūyah (text, "Shiri"), son of Abarwiz, and his brothers, and where the king had appointed tutors to educate them. [He had also appointed] cavalry guards (asāwirah) to prevent them leaving that place. They now brought out Shirūyah and

936. A Persian financial official, Zādhān-fārrūkh, with the nickname of "the one-eyed one," later figures in the Islamic historians' accounts of the naqī al-dīwān in Iraq, i.e., the change from Persian to Arabic as the administrative language of the finance department, effected by the caliph 'Abd al-Malik's governor of Iraq and the East, al-Hajjā b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafi. See, e.g., al-Baladhuri, Futūh, 300–301; al-Jahshiyārī, Kitāb al-wuzūrā' wa-al-kuttāb, 38–39; M. Sprengling, "From Persian to Arabic," 185–90, 194–97. Of course, this Zādhān-fārrūkh lived some three generations after Khusraw's commander of the guard, and it is unknown whether there was any family connection between the two men. On the name Zādhān-fārrūkh "the fortunate one," see Justi, Namenbuch, 377.

937. The ruins of "the palace" ('aqr) of Babel lay just to the north of the later Islamic town of al-Hillah and slightly to the east of the Sūrā canal. See Le Strange, Lands, 72; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 150.
entered the town of Bih Ardashîr (text, "Bahurasîr") by night. They released all those in the prisons there, and these freed captives were joined by the fugitive troops whom Kîsrâ had intended to put to death. They all shouted, "Qubâdh (i.e., Shîrûyah) for supreme ruler (shahanshâh)!" The next morning they proceeded to the open space before Kîsrâ' [s palace]. His palace guards took to their heels, and Kîsrâ himself fled, in great terror, unaccompanied by anyone, to one of the gardens adjacent to his palace called the Bâgh al-Hinduwân. But he was sought out and then apprehended on the day Ādhar of the month Adhar, and imprisoned in the palace of government (dâr al-mamlakah). Shîrûyah entered that palace, and the leading figures gathered round him and proclaimed him king. He sent a message to his father bitterly upbraiding him for his conduct.

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hîshâm b. Muhammad, who said: Kîsrâ Abarwîz had eighteen sons, the eldest of whom was Shahrîyâr, whom Shîrîn had adopted as a son. The astrologers told Kîsrâ, "One of your sons will himself have a son, at whose hands this throne will come to ruin and this kingdom be destroyed. The distinguishing sign of this son will be a defect in a certain part of his body." For that reason, Kîsrâ thereupon kept his sons separated from all women, and they remained for a long time with no access to a woman. At last, Shahrîyâr complained to Shîrîn about this, sending to her a message in which he complained about his lust for women and asked her to provide him with a woman. If he could have no woman, he would kill himself. She sent a message back to him: "I can't manage to get women into your presence, except a woman of no consequence who wouldn't be suitable for you to touch." He replied, "I don't care who she is, as long as she is a woman!" So she sent to him a maiden whom she was wont to employ for being cupped. According to what is asserted, this maiden was the daughter of one of the Persian nobles, but Shirin had become angry with her for some reason or another and had consigned her to the ranks of the cuppers.940 When Shirin introduced the maiden into Shahriyar's presence, he immediately leapt on her, and she became pregnant with Yazdajird. Shirin gave orders regarding her, and she was kept carefully confined until she gave birth. The fact of the child's birth was kept secret for five years.

At that point, Shirin noticed that Kisra had acquired a tenderness toward young children, at this time when he was growing old, so she said to him, "O king, would it gladden your heart to see a child of one of your own sons, even though this might entail something untoward?" He replied, "[Yes,] I don't care [what might happen]." She gave commands for Yazdajird to be perfumed and decked out with fine clothes, and she had him brought into Kisra's presence, saying, "This is Yazdajird, son of Shahriyar!" Kisra summoned him, clasped him to his breast, kissed him, yearned toward him, and displayed great affection for him; and from then onward he kept Yazdajird close to him. One day, the boy was playing in his presence when he remembered what had been foretold, so he summoned him, had his clothes taken off, inspected him from the front and the back, and perceived clearly the defect (or, "the defect was clearly apparent," istabāna al-naqs) in one of his hips. He was now filled with anger and distress, and dragged the boy off in order to dash him to the ground. But Shirin clung to him and besought Kisra by God not to kill him, telling Kisra, "If this is something that is going to befall this state, then there is no possibility of changing it." He replied. "This boy is the agent of ill-fortune about whom I was informed (i.e., by the astrologers), so get rid of him. I don't want ever to see him again!" Shirin therefore gave orders for the boy to be sent to Sijistan; but others say that, on the contrary, he was in the Sawad with his guardians at a village called Khumāniyah.941

940. On Shirin, see n. 729 above. In Islamic times at least, phlebotomy, the function of the cupper, was regarded as particularly menial and degrading, doubtless from the fact that such bodily services were usually performed by slaves. See EI2 Suppl., s.v. Faṣṣād, Ḥadjdjam [M. A. J. Beg].
941. The story of Yazdagird's birth and upbringing is doubtless a popular tale
The Persians rose up against Kisra and killed him, aided by his son Shiruyah, son of Maryam, the Byzantine woman (al-Rūmiyyah).942 The duration of his (i.e., Kisra’s) power was thirty-eight years.943 After the elapsing of thirty-two years, five months, and fifteen days of his rule, there took place the Prophet’s migration from Mecca to Medina.944

After him there succeeded to the royal power Shiruyah,945 whose [regnal] name was Qubadh (II).

He was the son of [Kisra II] Abarwiz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of Kisra (I) Anusharwan. It has been mentioned that the great men of state from the Persians came into Shiruyah’s presence when he had become king and after he had imprisoned his father, and said to him, “It is not fitting that we should have two kings: either you kill Kisra, and we will be your faithful and obedient servants, or we shall depose you and give our obedience to him just as we that endeavored to account for the eventual disaster that overtook Yazdagird III, the last of his line to rule in Persia, and the Sāsānids dynasty as a whole.

Khumāniyah must be the Humāniyyah or Humayniyyah on the west bank of the Tigris below al-Madai’in and just below the confluence of that river and the Kūthā canal, a place which later became of some importance in early ‘Abbāsid times. See Nöldeke, “Zur orientalischen Geographie,” 94 n. 1; Le Strange, Lands, 37.

942. See on the question of Maryam al-Rūmiyyah and the historicity or otherwise of her marriage with Khusrav Abarwiz, al-Ṭabarī, I, 999, p. 312 and n. 729 above.

944. This is very accurate, given that the Hijrah took place in Rabi’ I of the year 1/September 622.

always did before you secured the royal power." These words struck fear into Shirūyah’s heart and crushed him. He ordered Kisrā to be transported from the palace of government to the house of a man called Mārasfand. Kisrā was set on a common nag, with his head covered, and conveyed to that house escorted by a detachment of troops. On the way, they brought him past a shoemaker who was sitting in a booth that led out on to the road. When the shoemaker saw the detachment of cavalry troops escorting a single rider with a muffled head, he realized that the covered-up figure was Kisrā and he struck at him with a shoemaker’s last. One of the troops escorting Kisrā turned on the shoemaker, unsheathed his sword, cut off the shoemaker’s head, and then rejoined his comrades.

When Kisrā was installed in Mārasfand’s house, Shirūyah assembled together all the great men of state and the members of leading families who were at court and addressed them: “We have thought fit, in the first place to send an envoy to our father the king setting forth all his evil actions in his government and drawing his attention to various aspects of these.” Then he sent for a man from Ardashir Khurrah, who was called Asfadh Jushnas and who, because of his position as head of the [royal] secretaries, was in charge of governing the kingdom. Shirūyah said to him, “Off you go to our father the king and tell him in our name that we have not been the cause of the unhappy state into which he has fallen, nor is any member of the subject population responsible, but God has condemned you to His divine retribution in return for your evil conduct. [First,] your crime against your father Hurmuz, your violence toward him, depriving him of the royal power, blinding his eyes, killing him in a most horrible fashion, and all the great burden of guilt you have brought upon yourself by injur-

946. Al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 107, has for this name H.r.s.f.t.h.
947. Nöldeke, trans. 362 n. 2, noted that, in Firdawsi, the shoemaker often serves as the outspoken representative of the masses, sometimes with comic touches; even so, he is not allowed here to mock and slight the fallen monarch.
948. Correcting the text’s ra‘is al-katibah [which would mean something like “head of the cavalry of the military host”; katibah = “detachment of cavalry”] in the light of the parallel passage in al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwāl, 107, who has ra‘is kuttāb al-rasā‘īl “head of the secretaries responsible for official correspondence.” Cf. also Nöldeke, trans. 362 n. 3.
ing him. [Second,] your bad treatment of us, your sons, by keeping us from all access to and participation in good things, and from everything which would have brought us ease of life, enjoyment, and happiness. [Third,] your bad treatment of those whom you condemned to perpetual imprisonment, to the point that they suffered hardship from extreme deprivation, wretched living conditions and food, and separation from their homelands, wives, and children. [Fourth,] your lack of consideration for the women whom you appropriated for yourself; your failure to show them any love or affection and to send them back to live with those men by whom they already had children and progeny; and your keeping them confined in your palace against their wills.949 [Fifth,] what you have inflicted on your subjects generally in levying the land tax and in treating them with harshness and violence. [Sixth,] your amassing a great amount of wealth, which you exacted from the people with great brutality so that you drove them to consider your rule hateful and thereby brought them into affliction and deprivation. [Seventh,] your stationing the troops for long periods along the frontiers with the Byzantines and on other frontiers, thereby separating them from their families.950 [Eighth,] your treacherous behavior toward Mawriq (Maurice), the king of the Byzantines and your ingratitude for his praiseworthy actions on your behalf, in that he sought refuge with you, exerted himself laudably for you, protected you from the malevolence of your enemies, and increased the fame of your name by giving to you in marriage the noblest and most precious in his sight of his daughters. Moreover, you regarded your rightful obligations to him lightly and refused to grant his request of you regarding the return of the wooden [True] Cross, to which neither you nor any of your fellow countrymen had any entitlement or need.951 You know

949. Nöldeke, trans. 364 n. 2, noted that this complaint about the seizure of married women for the ruler's harem has the ring of authenticity.

950. For this complaint, in early Islamic times technically known as tajmir, see n. 151 above.

951. When Sheroy brought the lengthy war with Heraclius to an end, the return of the True Cross to Jerusalem was one of the provisions of the peace treaty. The Byzantine emperor brought it back to the Holy City personally, but the date of his visit is notoriously difficult to ascertain and has been much discussed. The restoration of the Cross was subsequently celebrated on 14 September 629, but the city this well [now]. If you have explanations or exculpations to adduce to us and to the subjects, then bring them forward; if you don’t have any, then show your contrition swiftly to God and return to Him, until we announce our intentions concerning you."

Asfādh Jushnas committed to his mind this message to Kisrā from Shirūyah and set off from Shirūyah’s court in order to convey it to him. When he reached the place where Kisrā was imprisoned, he found a man called Jilinūs (Jalinūs), the commander of the guard who had been entrusted with keeping ward over Kisrā, seated there. He held conversation with Jilinūs for a while, and then Asfādh Jushnas asked him for permission to go into Kisrā in order to deliver a message from Shirūyah. Jilinūs went back and drew the curtain that veiled access to Kisrā, went into his presence, and said to him, “May God grant you long life! Asfādh Jushnas is at the gate, has recounted that the king Shirūyah has sent him to you with a message, and now seeks an audience with you. So decide according to your will what you wish to do.”

Kisrā was, according to some authorities, recaptured in a March, probably March 630. See Nöldeke, trans. 365 n. 2, 392 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 244-45; N. H. Baynes, “The Restoration of the Cross at Jerusalem,” 287-99; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule, 50.

952. Nöldeke, trans. 363 n. 1, regarded this denunciation and Khusraw’s rejoinder, with their fullest extant texts given here by al-Tabari, as artistic renderings of an exchange of complaints and justifications composed by someone close to the actual events yet writing after the deaths of Khusraw, Shērūy, and the latter’s son Ardashīr during the reign of Khusraw’s grandson Yazdagird III, when the Sāsānid house was still reigning in Persia. Al-Ya’qūbī, Ta’rikh, I, 196, has only a brief reference to Shērūy’s risālah ghalīzah, “harsh letter,” but al-Dinawārī, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 107–10, has quite a lengthy version.

953. Jalinūs or Jālinūs (whose name looks Greek rather than Persian, possibly he was a Christian and had adopted a Christian name in addition to an unknown, purely Persian one) is described by al-Dinawārī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 107, as ra’is al-jund al-mustamītah, “commander of the troops who seek death,” the ruler’s personal guard (in Middle Persian, the gyān-abetesparān, “those who sacrifice their lives”). He was later to be a leading general of the Persian troops combating the Arab invaders of Iraq and fell at al-Qādisīyyah. See al-Balādhūrī, Futūḥ, 258, 260; al-Tabārī, I, 2169–72, 2174, etc., tr. Khalid Yahya Blankenship, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XI, The Challenge to the Empires, 183-86, 188, etc., and I, 2357, tr. Yohanan Friedmann, ibid., XII, The Battle of al-Qādisiyyah and the Conquest of Syria and Palestine, 141; Nöldeke, trans. 365 n. 2.

954. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 366 n. 2, the imprisoned Khusraw Abarwēz is treated throughout as a monarch, with the correct etiquette of address observed, so that Jālinūs addresses him with the formula anōṣag buwādī! "may he be immortal!"
smiled and said in a joking manner, "O Jilinus, son of Asfadh (Jilinus Asfadhan), what you say is contrary to what intelligent persons say. For if it is the case that the message you have mentioned is from the king Shiruyah, then, in the face of his royal power, it is not for us to grant permission to enter. If we do have authority for granting permission to enter or to exclude, then Shiruyah is not king. But the relevant aphorism here is what is said, 'God wills a thing, and it is; the king commands a thing, and it is put into execution.' So let Asfadh Jushnas enter and deliver the message he bears."

When Jilinus heard this speech, he went out from Kisra's presence, took Asfadh Jushnas's hand, and said to him, "Arise, and come into Kisra's presence, in a correct manner." Asfadh Jushnas accordingly stood up, called for one of the attendants accompanying him, and handed him the robe he [ordinarily] wore, pulled out a clean, white cloth from his sleeve and used it to wipe his face. Then he went into Kisra's presence. When he came face to face with him, he fell down before him in prostration. Kisra ordered him to get up. Hence he arose and did obeisance before Kisra. Kisra was seated on three Khusrawani rugs woven with gold, which had been laid on a silken carpet, and he was lolling back on three cushions likewise woven with gold. In his hand he had a yellow, well-rounded quince. When he noticed Asfadh Jushnas, he sat up in a cross-legged position and placed the quince on the place where he had been sitting. Because it was perfectly round and because of the smoothness of the cushion on the seat, plumped out with its stuffing, it rolled down from the topmost of the three cushions on to the upper one of the three rugs, then from the rug to the carpet, finally rolling off the carpet to the ground, where it rolled some distance, becoming covered with dirt. Asfadh Jushnas

955. Echoing frequent Qur'anic phraseology, e.g., in XXXVI, 82; XL, 70/68.
956. The text has shushtaqah for this cloth. The Glossarium, p. CCCXI, has shustaqah and adduces the commentary to Abū Dulaf al-Khazrāji's Qaṣīdah sāsāniyyah as given in al-Thaʿalibi's Yatīmat al-dahr; but the word here should be read as suftajahu "his financial draft." See Bosworth, The Mediaeval Islamic Underworld, The Banū Sāsān in Arabic Society and Literature, II, The Arabic Jargon Texts, Arabic text 7, comm. v. 34, tr. 193. In any case, it seems that the action here is not that of wiping the face clean but of placing the pandūmah over the mouth to prevent pollution of a sacred object, in this case, the king's person. See Nöldeke, trans. 367 n. 1, and n. 892 above.
picked it up and rubbed it with his sleeve, moving forward to present it to Kisrā. But the latter gestured to Asfād Jushnas to keep it away from him, and told him, "Take it away from me!" So Asfād Jushnas laid it on the ground at the carpet's edge, fell back, stood in his old place, and did obeisance before Kisrā by putting his hand on his breast. Kisrā lowered his head and then uttered the aphorism appropriate to the incident: "When one encounters adversity, there is no means or device (hilah) for making things go forward again, and when things do go well, there is no means or device which is able to reverse them. These two things happen in turn, but means and devices are lacking in both cases." Then he said to Asfād Jushnas, "Thus this quince has rolled down and fallen where it did, and become smeared with dirt. It is for us an announcement, as it were, of the message you have been charged with bringing, what you are going to do with it, and its results. For indeed, the quince, which denotes what is good, fell from the heights to the depths; it did not stay on the coverings of our seat but speedily fell to the ground, ending up far away and covered in dirt. All this happening indicates a bad omen, that the glory of the monarchs has passed into the hands of the common masses, that we have been deprived of royal power, and that it will not remain long in the hands of our successors before it passes to persons who are not of royal stock (min ahl al-mamlakah). Now get on with it, and speak about the message you have been charged with delivering and the words with which you have been provided!" Asfād Jushnas then began to retail the message Shirūyah had charged him to deliver, not leaving out a single word and getting the sequence of its phrases exactly right.

Kisrā made the following answer to that message: Convey back to Shirūyah, the short-lived one, [the message] from me that it

957. It appears from this that the quince was regarded by the Persians as an emblem of good fortune (perhaps not uninfluenced by the closeness in form of bih, "good," and bihi, "quince" = the Arabic safarjalah used here in al-Ṭabari's text); cf. Glossarium, p. CCXCI. The significance of the quince subsequently became the focus of a minor academic controversy among German orientalists; see the details in Muth, Die Annalen von al-Ṭabari im Spiegel der europäischen Bearbeitungen, 58-59.

958. Prophetic of Shērōy's brief period of power and his early death through epidemic disease or, according to one report, by poisoning, see al-Ṭabari, I, 1061, p. 399, and n. 984 below.
is not fitting for an intelligent person that he should spread around about anyone [tales of] venial sins and minor misdeeds without having thoroughly convinced himself of their truth and being completely certain in his own mind about them, let alone the gross sins and crimes that you have spread around and published abroad, and that you have imputed to us and laid at our door. Moreover, the person who can best repel with contumely a sinner and condemn the perpetrator of a crime is the one who has kept himself free from all sins and crimes. O man who will be short reigned, O man of little understanding, even if we were guilty of what you have imputed to us, it is unfitting that you should spread it abroad and upbraid us. For if you do not recognize the defects you yourself possess, since you have spread them around concerning us as you have done, you should be fully aware of your own defects. So cut short your blaming us and finding fault with us, since your ill-chosen speech only increases the public awareness of your own ignorance and lack of judgment.

O one devoid of reason, deficient in knowledge! If there is any real basis for your efforts in showing us up publicly as guilty of sins which deserve death for us and you have some real proof for it, then [you should remember that] the judges among your own religious community [i.e., the Zoroastrian one] prevent the son of a man who has merited death from assuming his father's position and keep him from contact with the best people, from sitting with them and from mingling with them, except in a small number of places, much less making him king. Furthermore, we have attained—praise be to God and [thanks for] His beneficence!—through our upright behavior and intentions and in our relationship with God, with the adherents of our religious community and faith, and with the whole group of our sons, a position in which we have in no way fallen short nor deserved any proof of guilt or any reproach. We shall explain the situation regarding the sins you have imputed to us and the crimes you have laid at our door, without any attempt on our part to diminish anything in the arguments we have put forward and the proofs we have adduced, if only so that you might acquire fuller knowledge of your own lack of judgment, absence of reason and the evil nature of your actions.

[First,] regarding what you have mentioned in regard to our father Hurmuz, our rejoinder here is that evil and malevolent persons had incited him against us, to the point that he grew suspicious of us and was carried away by hatred and rancor against us. We perceived his revulsion from us and his bad opinion of us, and we accordingly became fearful of remaining in his proximity, so removed ourselves from his court out of fear from him and made our way to Azerbaijan. By that time, the royal power had become dissolved and split apart, as is well known. As soon as we received news of what had happened to him, we set out from Azerbaijan for his court. But the false-hearted (munāfiq) Bahrām [Chūbīn] assailed us with a great army of rebels, whose conduct merited death, threw off his obedience, and drove us out of the kingdom. We sought asylum in the land of the Byzantines, and came back from there with troops and war materials, and made war on him. As a result, he fled before us and ended up in the land of the Turks, with destruction and perdition, as has been generally known among people.

Finally, when we had achieved firm control of the realm and our authority was made firm and, with the help of God, we had dispelled for our subjects all the afflictions and calamities, on the brink of which they had been, we then said [to ourselves], “One of the best courses of action with which we can inaugurate our ruling policy and begin our royal power is to take vengeance for our father, to secure requital for him and to kill all those involved in [shedding] his blood.” Then, when we had firmly accomplished all our intentions regarding that and had attained what we were aiming at, we turned our attention to other aspects of the governance of the kingdom. So we put to death everyone who had a share in [shedding] his blood or who had schemed and plotted against him.

[Second,] regarding what you have mentioned concerning our sons, our rebuttal here is that all the sons whom we brought into the world, with the exception of those whom God chose to take back unto Himself, were perfectly sound in the limbs of their bodies. But we appointed for you guards and restrained you from getting mixed up in things that did not concern you, out of a desire to prevent you from doing harm to the land and the subjects. So we established for you ample means for your living expenses, such as for your clothing, for your riding mounts, and for everything you needed, as you well know. In respect to you [i.e., Shīrūyah] in particular, the story is that the astrologers had decreed from your horoscope (kitāb mawlidika) that you would bring evil upon us, or that evil would happen through your agency. Nevertheless, we did not order you to be put to death but put a seal on the document indicating your horoscope and handed it over to our consort Shirin's keeping. In confirmation of the fact that we placed full credence in that document with the indication [of the horoscope], it happened that Furumishā, king of India, wrote to us in the thirty-sixth year of our reign, having sent a delegation of his subjects to us. He wrote about all sorts of things and sent to us and to you, the ensemble of our sons, presents, together with a letter to each one of you. His presents to you—you will recall them!—comprised an elephant, a sword, a white falcon, and a brocade coat woven with gold. When we looked at the presents he had sent you, we found that he had written on his letter to you, in the Indian language, "Keep the contents of this secret." We then gave orders that all the presents or letters he had sent to each of you should be passed on to you all, and we [merely] kept back his letter to you because of its superscription. We sent for an Indian scribe and ordered the letter's seal to be broken and its contents to be read out. There was written there, 'Rejoice, be refreshed in spirit and be happy in mind, for you will be crowned on the day Day ba-Ādhar in the month of Ādhar of the thirty-eighth year of Kisra's reign and be hailed as holder of his royal power and ruler of his lands.' We were convinced that you would only attain to royal power through our own destruction and perdition, yet despite being certain about this, we did not make any reduction in the living allowances, subsidies, presents, and such, previously assigned to you, let alone order you to be put to death. We resealed

959. As correctly conjectured by Nöldeke, trans. 371 n. 1, this name reflects that of a leading king of the early mediaeval northern Deccan, but to be rendered as Pulakesin II (r. ca. 609-42), from the Chālukya dynasty. It would thus have been perfectly possible for Khusrav Abarwēz to have received a delegation from this ruler in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, i.e., 626. See A. L. Basham, The Wonder That Was India. A Survey of the Culture of the Indian Sub-Continent before the Coming of the Muslims, 74-75; R. C. Majumdar [ed.], The History and Culture of the Indian People, III, The Classical Age, 234-41. An alternative interpretation of this name was suggested, however, by von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte," 746: that it represents the common Indian royal title Parmēša "supreme lord."

960. See al-Tabari, I, 1043, p. 379 and n. 938 above.
Furumīshā's letter with our own seal and entrusted it to our consort Shirīn, who is still alive and sound in mind and body. If you wish to retrieve from her the indications of your horoscope and Furumīshā's letter to you and read them both in order to bring home to you your contrition and loss, then do it!

[Third.] in regard to what you have mentioned concerning the condition of those condemned to perpetual imprisonment, we say in justification that the ancient kings, from the time of Jayūmart [Kayūmarth] till the reign of Bishtāsb,\textsuperscript{961} used to conduct their royal power by means of justice, and then continuously from the time of Bishtāsb till we ourselves assumed power, they conducted it by means of justice combined with religious piety. Now, since you are so devoid of reason, knowledge, and education, ask the authorities [hāmalah] in religion, the basic supports (literally, "tent pegs," awtād) of this religious community, about the position of those who rebel against and disobey the kings, who break their oaths, and those who have merited death for their sins, and they will tell you that they do not deserve to be shown mercy or forgiveness. Know that, despite all this, we have only condemned to perpetual imprisonment in our gaols those who, if an equitable judgment were to be made, have merited being killed or blinded or having a hand or leg or some other limb cut off. How often have those appointed to guard them, or various of our ministers, mentioned the well-deserved fate of those who merit execution and have said, "Kill them speedily, before they find ways and means of killing you!" Yet, because of our wish to spare lives and our dislike of shedding blood, we acted slowly and deliberately with them and left them to God, and we used not to go further in punishing them beyond the imprisonment to which we limited ourselves in inflicting, beyond depriving them of eating meat, drinking wine, and enjoying the fragrance of aromatic herbs. In none of these things that were withheld were we going beyond what is in the precepts of the religious community in regard to keeping those who have merited death from enjoying the pleasures of life and easy circumstances. [On the contrary,] we used to allot for them the food, drink, and other necessities for keeping them in good health, and we used not to keep them from access to their womenfolk and from the possibility of contact for siring children and producing progeny while they were imprisoned. Now the news has reached us that you have decided to set free these evil doers and evil wishers who merit execution and to give orders for demolishing their gaol. If you do release them, you will sin against God your Lord, bring down harm upon yourself, and inflict injury on your own faith and the injunctions and legal prescriptions contained in it, which deny mercy and forgiveness for those who deserve execution. In addition to this, [there is the fact] that the enemies of kings never love kingly power, and those who rebel against kings never furnish them obedience. The wise men have given the warning, "Don't hold back from punishing those who have merited punishment, for such hesitation entails an impairment of justice and harmful effects on the governance of the kingdom." Although it may give you a certain feeling of joy when you set free those evil doers, evil wishers, and rebels who deserve execution, you will certainly experience the [baleful] result of that in your conduct of government and the introduction of the severest harm and calamitousness for the people of your religious community.

\textsuperscript{961} That is, from the time of Gayōmard (thus the MP form), the first man, to that of Gushtāsp [Avestan Wištāspa-, MP Wīshtāsp], son of Luhrāsp, in whose reign Zoroaster is supposed to have arisen. See Yarshater, “Iranian Common Beliefs and World View,” 352–53; idem, “Iranian National History,” 376–77, 466–69.

[Fifth,]962 regarding your allegations that we have only acquired, gathered together, and laid up in our treasuries wealth, equipment and utensils, grain, and so forth, from the lands of our kingdom by means of the harshest methods of tax gathering, the most pressing demands on our subjects, and the most violent tyranny, rather than from the lands of the enemy by making war on them and forcible seizure by ourselves of their possessions, our reply is as follows. The best answer to any statement uttered with gross ignorance and stupidity is not to give any answer at all, but we have not wished to leave this aside, since not giving an answer is tantamount to affirming the truth [of the original statement]. Our rejoinder to the accusations laid against us is a vigorous rebuttal of

---

962. As Nöldeke, trans. 374 n. 1, noted, this fifth section of Khusraw's response covers both Shéroy's fifth and sixth accusations without clearly distinguishing the two. Shéroy's seventh and eighth accusations are not addressed by his father, as least in the words that have come down to us.
them, and our clear exculpation is an exposition of what you have sought from us regarding it.

Know, O ignorant one, that, after God, it is only wealth and troops that can uphold the royal authority of monarchs, this being especially the case with the kingdom of Persia, whose lands are surrounded by enemies with gaping mouths ready to gulp down what the kingdom possesses. The only thing that can keep them from it and fend them off from those lands they avidly desire to seize for themselves, is numerous troops and copious quantities of weapons and war material. Now numerous troops and everything necessary for these can only be acquired by having a great deal of wealth and ample quantities of it; and wealth can only be amassed and gathered together, for any contingency which may arise, by strenuous efforts and dedication in levying this land tax. We are not the first ones to have gathered together wealth; on the contrary, we have merely imitated here our forefathers and our predecessors in past times. They collected wealth just as we have, and amassed great quantities of it, so that it might constitute a firm backing for them in strengthening their armies, in upholding their authority, and in [making possible] other things for which wealth must inevitably be amassed. But then the false-hearted one Bahram, with a gang of people like himself and with desperadoes who merited being put to death, attacked that wealth and those jewels in our treasuries. They scattered and dispersed them and went off with a great deal of them, and they left behind in our storehouses of wealth and treasuries only a few of our weapons which they were unable to scatter to the winds or remove or else had no desire for them. When, God be praised, we recovered our kingly power and our authority was firmly reestablished, when the subjects submitted to us and gave obedience, and we removed the calamities which had befallen them, we dispatched to the outlying parts of our land Ishbadhs, we appointed below them in those regions Fadhushans, and we nominated over the frontier zones Marzbans and courageous, energetic, and tough executive officials. All those whom we appointed we provided with a strong backing of numerous troops, and these officials led vigorous campaigns against the hostile kings and the enemies into the lands facing their own territories. From the thirteenth year of our reign onward, their raids against the enemies, the slaughter they wrought, and the captives they took, [reached to such an extent] that none of those hostile rulers could dare to raise his head even in the heart of his own kingdom except under a protective cover, with fearfulness, or under a grant of protection from us, let alone to mount a raid into any part of our land or to engage in anything unacceptable to us. Hence during all this period of years, there came into our storehouses of wealth and our treasuries what had been seized as plunder from the lands of our enemies, comprising gold, silver, all sorts of jewels, copper, steel, silk, silk brocades (istabraq), brocade coats, horses, weapons, captured women and children and male prisoners, whose enormous extent cannot be concealed and whose value is known to everyone.

When at the end of the thirteenth year of our reign we gave instructions for the engraving of new dies for coins (naqsh sikak hadithah), so that we might give our orders for beginning the minting of new silver coinage with their aid, there was found at the end of the minting process in our storehouses of wealth, according to what was reported back to us by the persons charged with counting the silver which was left there, apart from the sums of money which we had instructed should be set aside for paying the salaries of our troops, two hundred thousand purses of silver coinage, containing eight hundred million mithqâls [in weight].

When we perceived that we had made our frontiers secure, had repulsed the enemy from them and from our subjects, had put a muzzle on their mouths, which had been gaping open to swallow up what they had acquired, had extended over them (i.e., the subjects) security, and had preserved the inhabitants of the four outlying quarters of our land from calamities and raids, we gave orders

963. That is, the year 602, when the Byzantine emperor Maurice was overthrown and murdered (see n. 743 above), after which Khusraw could claim to be avenging the death of the usurper Phocas.

964. This is itself a loanword in Arabic [and in Syriac], and an early one, since it is used in the Qur'an of the silk brocade garments of the saved in Paradise (XVIII, 30/31; XLIV, 53; etc.). See Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 8 n. 2, 13; Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur'an, 58–60.

965. Here, as Nöldeke pointed out, trans. 376 n. 2, not meaning a weight in gold.
for the collection of the arrears of taxation remaining from previous years and for the restoration to their original place of all the gold and silver that had been carried off from our storehouses of wealth and all the jewels and copperware that had come from our treasuries.\textsuperscript{966} Hence at the end of the thirtieth year of our reign we gave orders for the engraving of new dies for coins, from which silver coins could be struck, and there was found in our storehouses of wealth, apart from what we had ordered to be set aside for paying the salaries of our troops and apart from the sums of money already counted up for us previously, four hundred thousand purses of silver coinage, containing one billion, six hundred million mithqals [in weight]. All this in addition to what God added for us to those sums of money from what He presented to us as booty and of His liberality and lavishness upon us, out of the wealth of the rulers of Byzantium which the wind brought us in ships and which we called "plunder of the winds (\textit{fay' al-riyāḥ})."\textsuperscript{967}

From the thirtieth year of our reign to the thirty-eighth, which is the present year, our stores of wealth have not ceased growing in extent and richness, our lands in florescence, our subjects in security and tranquility, and our frontiers and peripheral regions in impregnability and strength of defenses. We have now heard that you intend, because of the abysmally low level of your manly virtues, to scatter abroad and destroy all this wealth, acting on the advice of evil doers who merit being put to death.\textsuperscript{968} We are now telling you, however, that those treasures and wealth were only \textsuperscript{966}. These activities, as Nöldeke noted, trans. 377 n. 1, could hardly have been carried out without using violence, with resultant great hardship for the populace, and in the case of the recovery of wealth allegedly filched from the central treasury, the innocent would doubtless suffer equally with the guilty.

\textsuperscript{967}. This may conceivably relate distantly to an actual happening. Ibn Qutaybah, \textit{Maʿārif}, 665, says that a fleet of the king of Constantinople bearing treasure was cast up on the Mediterranean shores at Alexandria (the \textit{khazāʿin al-riḥ}), and, slightly more circumstantially, al-Masʿūdi, \textit{Murūj}, II, 227–8 = § 647, says that a fleet of treasure ships of Phocas was thrown up on the Syrian coast at Antioch, where Khusraw's general Shahrbarāz was able to seize the wealth and forward it to his master. Nöldeke, trans. 378 n. 1, cited an authority who suggested that the incident might relate to some treasure that Heraclius despatched to North Africa, before he became involved in the Persian wars, and which was lost at sea.

\textsuperscript{968}. According to Ibn Qutaybah, \textit{Maʿārif}, 665, Shērūy lightened taxes and did not collect the \textit{kharāj}.
gathered together through exposing one’s life to danger and after intense exertion and effort in order to repel by means of them the enemies who were surrounding the lands of this kingdom and who were pursuing courses aimed at getting full control of what they had acquired. Enemies like these can only be driven off, in all periods and times, and after receiving help from God, by wealth and troops; troops can only be kept strong by wealth; and wealth is only of use when it is available in large and extensive amounts. So don’t contemplate dividing out this wealth and don’t rush rashly into doing it, for wealth is a protection for your royal power and your land, and a source of strength for you against your enemies.

Asfadh Jushnas then went back to Shiruyah and related to him what Kisra had said to him, not leaving out a single word. The great men of state among the Persians came back and told Shiruyah, “It is not fitting that we should have two kings. Either you give orders for Kisra to be put to death, and we shall be your servants, furnishing obedience to you, or else we shall depose you and give him obedience [once more].” These words struck fear into Shiruyah’s heart and crushed him. He ordered Kisra to be executed. Several men who had duties incumbent upon them of vengeance against Kisra responded to the call to kill him. But every time one of them came to Kisra, he heaped insults on the man and repelled him strongly. No one would undertake the task of killing Kisra until finally, a youth named Mihr Hurmuz, son of Mardanshah, went along to kill him. Mardanshah was Kisra’s Fadhhusbân over the province of Nimrûz and one of Kisra’s most obedient and trusty retainers.

Now some two years before his deposition, Kisra had asked his astrologers and diviners what his end would be, and they had... told him that his fated death (maniyyatahu)\textsuperscript{971} would come from the direction of Nimrûz. He accordingly grew suspicious of Mardânshâh and fearful of his proximity, on account of Mardânshâh’s great prestige and because there was no one in that region who could equal him in strength and power. Kisrâ had written to him instructing him to travel quickly to him, until by the time Mardânshâh had reached him, he had turned over in his mind how he might seek a pretext to kill him. But he had not found any fault in Mardânshâh. Kisrâ accordingly recoiled from killing him because of his knowledge about Mardânshâh’s faithful obedience to him, his good counsel to him and his eagerness to please the king. So he resolved to spare his life but to order his right hand to be cut off, and to compensate him for its loss by a grant of a large sum of money, lavishing wealth on him for this. Hence he sought for a pretext that would enable him to have Mardânshâh’s right hand cut off.\textsuperscript{972}

Hands and feet and heads used to be cut off in the open space before the royal palace (rahbat al-mulk).\textsuperscript{973} On the day when he had ordered Mardânshâh’s hand to be cut off, Kisrâ sent along a scout and observer (‘ayn), who was to come back to him and inform him of what he had heard Mardânshâh and the onlookers who were present saying. When Mardânshâh’s right hand was cut off, he took it up with his left hand, kissed it, and placed it in his bosom, and he began to lament over it with his tears streaming down, saying, “Alas for a mild and forbearing [hand], one which used to shoot, and write, and deal blows, and engage in sport, and dispensed largesse!” The man whom Kisrâ had sent along as a scout and observer over Mardânshâh went back to Kisrâ and told him what he had seen and heard Mardānshāh doing and saying. At this, Kisrā became full of tenderness and sympathy for him, and regretted his impetuosity regarding Mardānshāh. He sent a message to him via one of the great men of state expressing his regret for what he had done to Mardānshāh and telling him that he would fulfill, so far as was in his power, any request to him which Mardānshāh might make and would facilitate this for him. Mardānshāh sent back a message to Kisrā by that same envoy, invoking blessings on the king and saying, “O king, I have always recognized your beneficence to me, and I thank you for it; I have become fully convinced that what you have inflicted on me was done unwillingly. It was merely a stroke of fate that caused this. But I have one request to make of you: give me oaths that you will fulfill it, so that my mind may be set at rest. Also, send to me, on your solemn undertaking to fulfill the oath, a pious man of God, and then I will reveal and communicate [my request] to you.” Kisrā’s envoy returned to his master with this message, and Kisrā hastened to put into effect Mardānshāh’s request, and swore mighty oaths that he would without fail accede to his request so long as this last did not entail anything which would weaken the fabric of his royal power. Kisrā dispatched this message to Mardānshāh via the Chief [Zoroastrian] Priest [literally, “head of the murmurers,” ra’īs al-muzamzimān]. Mardānshāh sent back a message to Kisrā asking him to order his [Mardānshāh’s] execution, in order that the dishonor which [now] attached to him might be thereby effaced. Kisrā gave the requisite order for Mardānshāh’s head to be cut off, unwilling, as he asserted, to break his oath.

\textsuperscript{972}. The story of the mutilation of the courtier by the ruler because of the prognostication that the courtier’s son would bring about Khusraw’s death, is given very briefly in al-Ya’qûbî, \textit{Ta’rikh}, I, 196, with the tale cut short because of a lacuna in the manuscript used by the editor Houtsma.

\textsuperscript{973}. Nöldèke noted, trans. 380 n. 1, the predilection of Persian kings, from Achaemenid up to Qâjâr times, for public executions and mutilations.

When Mihr Hurmuz, Mardānshāh’s son, came into Kisrā’s presence, the latter asked Mihr Hurmuz his name and that of his father and his position in the state. He told him that he was Mihr Hurmuz, son of Mardānshāh, the Fādhūsbān of Nīmrūz. Kisrā said, “You are the son of a a noble, highly sufficient, and competent man whom we requited for his faithfulness and good counsel to us, and for his sufficiency and competence with us, in an undeserving manner; so set to, and get on with what you have been ordered to do!” So Mihr Hurmuz struck, with an axe that he held 974. That is, the dishonor of continuing to live as a mutilated person, hence unable to fill any office in the state or in the Zoroastrian church.

in his hand, several blows at the sinews of Kisra's neck running down to his shoulder, but these had no effect on Kisra. The latter was searched, and it was discovered that a jewel in the form of an amulet\(^{975}\) had been tied on his upper arm (or, "he had tied an amulet on his upper arm"). The amulet protected its wearer from the effects of a sword. The amulet was accordingly taken off Kisra, and then after that Mihr Hurmuz delivered a single blow which killed him.\(^{976}\)

The news was brought to Shiruyah, who tore the front part of the neck of his robe and wept copiously; he gave orders for Kisra's corpse to be borne to the place of sepulture. This was done. All the great men of state and the people of the classes just below them (\(afnā' al-nās\)^{977}) accompanied his corpse [to the place of burial]. He ordered Mihr Hurmuz executed. Kisra's tenure of royal power lasted thirty-eight years. He was killed on the day of Māh in the month of Adhar.\(^{978}\) Shiruyah killed seventeen of his brothers, men of good education, bravery, and the manly virtues,\(^{979}\) on the advice of his minister Fayruz\(^{980}\) and at the urging of one of the sons of Yazdīn, who was the official in charge of the [collection of the] land tax ([literally, "tithes," 'ushūr] from the entire lands for Kisra and who was called Shamṭā,\(^{981}\) that he should put them to death.

\(^{975}\) Apparently the reading here is \textit{kharazah} rather than \textit{hirzah}. See \textit{Addenda et emendanda}, p. xxcvi, and \textit{Glossarium}, pp. ccxvii–ccxviii.

\(^{976}\) Nöldeke, trans. 382 n. 1, discussed the information of other sources, including Christian ones, on the exact mode of Khusrāw's execution, but concluded that there was no firm evidence concerning this mode.

\(^{977}\) Arabic \textit{afnā'}, sing. \textit{finw}, is defined in the lexica as "people from mixed groups." Here the meaning clearly relates to people high in the Persian social hierarchy who alone would accompany the catafalque of a king. Nöldeke, trans. 382, has "die Ausgezeichneten der Leute," i.e., the most outstanding, prominent people.

\(^{978}\) Nöldeke, trans. 382 n. 2, gives the equivalent of this date as 29 February 628.

\(^{979}\) The Arabic sources, and also the Christian ones, have various totals for these brothers usually around sixteen to eighteen; Ḥamzah al-ʿIṣfahānī, \textit{Taʾrikh}, 54, actually names eighteen of them. See the discussion in Nöldeke, 383 n. 1.

\(^{980}\) Balʿāmī's Persian rendering of al-Ṭabarī's \textit{History}, tr. II, 346, makes Shēr-ūy's chief minister Barmak, son of Firūz, ancestor of the Barmaki family so prominent in the caliphate during early ʿAbbasid times. Nöldeke, trans. 313 n. 2, thought that this was a later touch inserted by an enemy of the Islamic Barmakis.

\(^{981}\) The very defective rendering of this name in the text was read thus by the editor Nöldeke, who identified Shamṭā's father Yazdīn from the Christian sources, Shiruyah was now afflicted by illness and never enjoyed any of the pleasures of this present world. He died at Daskarat al-Malik. He was an inauspicious figure for the house of Sasan. When he killed his brothers, he showed violent grief. It is said that, on the day after he had killed them, his two sisters Burin and Azarmidukht came into his presence and reviled and upbraided him harshly, saying, "Greed for a royal power which is still not yet firmly established has driven you to kill your father and all your brothers, and you have committed acts of dishonor." When he heard those words, he wept bitterly and tore the crown from off his head. All his days he was overwhelmed with cares and afflicted by sickness. It is said that he extirpated every member of his house on whom he could get his hands, and that plague spread during his time until most of the Persians perished. His tenure of royal power lasted eight months.

principally the Syriac historians and hagiographers and the conciliar acts of the Nestorian Church, as Khusrav's treasurer Yazdin (see n. 737 above). One Nestorian author, Thomas of Margã, describes Shamštã as the real driving force behind the conspiracy to dethrone Khusrav. See Nöldeke, trans. 357 n. 4, 383 n. 3. However, according to the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 30–31, Shamštã soon showed himself overly ambitious for power, was accused of conspiring to seize the throne, arrested, his right hand cut off and consigned to prison by Shêrôy. On the name Yazdin, see Justi, Namenbuch, 147–48. Whether this Yazdin was the same person as the governor of Armenia for Khusrav Abarwèz, the Yazdên of the Armenian historian Sebêos (see ibid.), is unclear.

982. And called by the Persians, according to al-Mas'ûdi, Murûtî, II, 232 – § 653, the equivalent of Arabic al-ghashûm, "the tyrannical one." On the other hand, the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 30, states that Shêrôy's reign was one of peace and security for the Christians of the realm.

984. This plague is mentioned in other sources (e.g., Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ârif, 665; al-Mas'ûdi, Murûtî, II, 232 – § 653; and Ibn al-Athîr, Kâmîl, I, 497) as having devastated Iraq, with, according to Ibn Qutaybah and Ibn al-Athîr, the king himself dying from the disease. Less probably, the Byzantine historian Theophanes states that Shêrôy was poisoned by his hostile stepmother Shirin; see Christensen, Sasanides, 497 n. 1.

985. Kawad II Shêrôy reigned for six or eight months in 628. His name appears on his coins as PYRWCY KWT. See on his coins Paruck, Säsánian Coins, 68, 390–92, 492, Plate XXII, Table XXX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table XIII, Plate 14; Selwood, Whitting and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 159–60; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238. The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ârif, 665; al-Ya'qûbi, Ta'rîkh, I, 196; al-Dinawari, al-Akhûbûr al-ṭiwâl, 110; al-Mas'ûdi, Murûtî,
After him there succeeded to the royal power Ardashir. [He was] the son of [Qubadh II] Shīrūyah, son of [Khusraw II] Abarwiz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of [Khusraw I] Anūsharwān, and was only a small child. It is said that he was only seven years old, since there was no grown-up person of judgment and experience left of the royal house; hence the great men of the Persian state made him king. 986 A man called Mih Ādhar Jushnas, who held the office of high steward of the table (rā‘āsat ašḥāb al-mā‘īdah),987 was in charge of his upbringing. He carried on the administration of the kingdom in an excellent fashion, and his firm conduct of it reached a point where no one would have been aware of Ardashir's youthfulness.

Shahrbarāz was at the frontier with Byzantium with troops whom Kīsrā had given him and had named "the fortunate ones" (al-su`adā'). 988 Kīsrā and Shīrūyah had continuously written to him regarding important matters in which they were involved, and had sought his advice concerning these. But now, since the great men of state of the Persians had not consulted him about raising Ardashir to the throne, he took that as a pretext for making accusations of criminal behavior and demands on them, and went as far as shedding blood, and made it an occasion for endeavoring to seize the royal power and to rise by means of that from the lowly status of serving people to the heights of royal power. Shahrbarāz treated Ardashir with contempt because of his youth

---

986. From this point onward, all the remaining Persian kings and queens, with the exception of the capable, non-Sasanid Shahrbarāz, who seized power for himself, were set on the throne as puppets of the nobility and great men of state and church.

987. In Persian, khwān-sālār, which Nöldeke noted, trans. 386 n. 2, was the term used by Bal'ami in his rendering of al-Ṭabarī's History.

988. Shahrbarāz made peace with Heraclius in July 629 at Arabissos in eastern Anatolia (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1008–1009, pp. 329–330 and n. 776 above), and was thus free to turn his attention to Mesopotamia and take advantage of the unsettled conditions there. Quite possibly he claimed to be the avenger of the murdered Khusraw Abarwēz, since al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tīwāl, 111, says that, when Shahrbarāz entered al-Maḍā'in, he put to death all those who had conspired to depose and kill Khusraw; cf. also Nöldeke, trans. 387 n. 1.
and acted arrogantly toward the great men of state. He decided to summon together the ruling classes of the people (al-nās) for a consultation over the matter of the royal power. He then advanced with his troops.

Meanwhile, Mih Ādhar Jushnas had embarked on fortifying and strengthening the walls and gates of the city of Ctesiphon, and he transferred Ardashīr and the remaining members of the royal house, their womenfolk, the contents of Ardashīr's treasury—that is, money and his treasure chests—and his horses, into the city of Ctesiphon. Shahbarāz's troops, with whom he now approached, numbered six thousand men from the Persian army on the Byzantine frontiers. 989 He took up a position near the city of Ctesiphon, besieged its inhabitants and fought with them, setting up ballistas against the city, but did not manage to enter it. When he realized that he was not strong enough to take it by force, he sought it by means of craft. He kept on inciting a man named Niw Khusraw, who was the commander of Ardashīr's guard, and Nāmdār Jushnas, son of Ādhar Jushnas, the Iṣbābah of Nimrūz, to treachery, until the two of them opened the gates of the city to Shahbarāz. Thus he entered it, seized a number of the leading men, and killed them, appropriating their wealth for himself and ravishing their womenfolk. At Shahbarāz's behest, a group of men killed Ardashīr, son of Shirūyah, in the second year of his reign, in the monarch of Bahman, on the night of the day Abān, in the palace of Khusraw Shāh Qubād. He had held the royal power for one year and six months. 990

989. As Nöldeke remarked, trans. 387 n. 2, it was indicative of the chaos and weakness into which the Persian state had fallen that such a modest force was able to take over the capital and secure power for Shahbarāz himself.

990. Nöldeke noted, trans. 388 n. 4, 432–33, that this date in Bahman, the tenth day of the eleventh month, corresponds to 27 April 630, and that Ardashīr's reign had, on the basis of his coins, two years, the first identical with the seven months making up the last year of his father Kawād II Šērūy and the second one of independent rule beginning on 17 June 629. His reign would thus total one year and slightly under six months. Ardashīr's name appears on his coins as 'RTIjSTR. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 68–69, 391–92, 491–92, Plate XXII, Table XXXI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table 13, Plate 14; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 161–63; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 258; EIr, s.v. Ardashīr III (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwal, 110–11 (wrongly named After him, there succeeded to the royal power Shahrbaraz, that is, Farrukhān, for the month of Isfandār(madh); he was not of the royal house of the kingdom. He proclaimed himself king, but when he sat down on the royal throne, his belly began to gripe, and this affected him so violently that he had no time to get to a latrine, hence he [swiftly] called for a bowl (tast), had it set down before the throne, and relieved himself in it.991

A man from the people of Ištakhr called Fus Farrūkh, son of Mā[h] Khurshidhān,992 and two of his brothers were roused to great anger at Shahrbaraz’s killing of Ardashīr and his seizure of the royal power. They felt an intense revulsion from that, and came together and swore mutually that they would kill him. All three of them belonged to the king’s personal guard. It was [at that time] the custom that, when the king rode out, his personal guard stood in two lines, with their mailed coats, helmets, shields, and swords, and with spears in their hands; then, when the king came up level with one of them, each of them laid his shield on the wooden forepart (qarabūs, i.e., pommel) of the king’s saddle993 and placed his forehead on it, as if he were prostrating himself on

---

991. This story is meant to heighten the enormity of Shahrbaraz’s temerity and his sacrilege by sitting down on the royal throne when he was not from the royal houses of the Arsacids or the Sasanids. The ensuing account of the ignominious treatment of his corpse after he had been assassinated likewise highlights this apparent strong sense of legitimacy among the Persian ruling classes. However, as Nöldeke, trans. 388 n. 7, noted, the corollary of this feeling that the direction of the state should never pass into the hands of those outside the ancient ruling dynasties meant that, in an age of epigoni, hopes of an infusion of fresh vigor and military initiative could never be realized, and the Persian realm sank into total collapse, together with the feeble remnants of the Sasanid royal house.

992. The first component of the name Fus Farrukh must be the MP pus, “son,” the whole name meaning “fortunate son,” see Justi, Namenbuch, 256, while Māh-Khwarshēd-ān would presumably be the patronym “son of Māh-Khwarshēd,” see ibid., 187.

993. The qarabūs was actually made up of two curved pieces of wood, the front one forming the forepart or pommel of the saddle and the rear one forming the troussequin. See Lane, Lexicon, 2509b.
the ground. Shahhrbaraz rode forth a few days after he had become king. Fus Farrûkh and his two brothers stood close to each other, and when Shahhrbaraz drew level with them, Fus Farrûkh struck him with his spear, followed by his two brothers. This took place in the month of Isfandârmadh on the day of Daybadin. 994 He fell down dead from his horse. They tied a rope round his leg and dragged him to and fro. A man from among the great men of state called Zâdhân Farrûkh, son of Shahhrdâran, a man called Mâhyây (?!), who was the instructor of the cavalrmen (mu’addib al-asâwirah), and a large number of the great men of state and members of leading families assisted Fus Farrûkh and his brothers in killing Shahhrbaraz. They also aided them in killing the various men who had assassinated Ardashîr, son of Shîrûyah, and they killed various members from the class of the great men of state. They then raised to the throne Bûrân, daughter of Kisrâ. Shahhrbaraz had held the royal power for forty days. 995

[Bûrân]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Bûrân, daughter of Kisrâ (II) Abarwîz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of Kisrâ (I) Anûshar-

---

994. The twenty-third day of the twelfth month, i.e., 9 June 630, according to Noldeke, trans. 389 n. 2.
995. Nöldeke, trans. 390 n. 1, 433–33, pointed out that we actually have a period of forty-two days from Ardashîr III’s death on 27 April 630, but that Shahhrbaraz’s proclamation of himself as ruler days later, hence making a reign of forty days, with Shahhrbaraz killed on 9 June. Shahhrbaraz did not apparently have time enough as king to mint his own coins. The other Arabic sources on his reign include al-Ya’qûbi, Ta’rikh, I, 196–97; al-Dinawarî, al-Akhbâr al-tiwâl, 111; al-Mas’ûdi, Murûtî, II, 233 = § 654; idem, Tanbîh, 102, tr. 146; Ibn al-Athîr, Kâmîl, I, 499. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarî, Bal’ami, tr. II, 348. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 497–98; Frye, “The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians,” 170–71, 178.

Some sources add at this point in their list of Sâsânid rulers, between Shahhrbaraz and Bûrân, Khusrâw (III), son of Kawâd (II) Shêrôy, son of Khusrâw (II) Abarwëz (or according to others—and this seems genealogically more likely—son of Khusrâw Abarwëz, and not his grandson). See Ibn Qutaybah, Ma’ârif, 666; al-Mas’ûdi, Murûtî, loc. cit.; idem, Tanbîh, loc. cit.; al-Khwârazmî, Mafâtîh al-‘ulûm, 104, who attributes to him the nickname of Kûtâb al-Qaṣîr “the short one.” These sources state that he had grown up in “the land of the Turks,” had heard of the dissensions within Persia and had decided to try his own luck there; but after a “reign” of only three months, apparently in some part of Khurâsân, he was killed by the governor there. See Nöldeke, trans. 433; Christensen, op. cit. 498; Frye, op. cit., 171.
It has been mentioned that she proclaimed on the day when she was hailed as queen, "I will pursue righteousness and ordain justice," and she entrusted Shahrbarâz's office to Fus Farrûkh and invested him with the office of her chief minister. She behaved kindly toward her subjects and spread justice among them. She gave orders for silver coins to be minted, and she repaired masonry bridges (al-qanātîr) and bridges of boats (al-justûr). She remitted for the people the arrears of land tax (baqāyā) due, and she wrote to them in general open letters concerning the policies of benevolence toward them that she intended to follow, and she mentioned the topic of the members of the royal house [of the Sasanids] who had perished. At the same time, she expressed the hope that God would show them, through solicitude for their welfare and firm policies deriving from her elevated position, what would let them realize that lands were not subdued through the strength and energy of men, that military camps were not laid open to plunder through their martial valor, and that victory was not gained through men's stratagems and hatreds extinguished, but all that comes from God, He is exalted and magnified. She further exhorted them to be obedient and urged them to be faithful. Her letters brought together everything that was necessary (i.e., for the subjects' guidance and welfare). She restored the wood of the [True] Cross to the ruler of Byzantium through the

996. Also named as Bûrân-dukht and, according to Hamzah al-Iṣfahâni, Ta'rikh, 54, a sister of Shêrûy and the daughter of Khusrâw Abarwêz's Byzantine princess wife, Maryam, daughter of Heraclius. Her descent on both sides would thus make her a very acceptable queen. The Anonymus Guidi, tr. 32–33, describes Bûrân as not only Shêrûy's sister but also his wife, this being quite possible in Nöledeke's view, ibid. 32 n. 5. For the name Bûrân/Bûrân, see Justi, Namenbuch, 70; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides en Moyen-Persé épigraphique, no. 209, cf. no. 208, considered by him as a hypocoristic from * baurāspa-, "having bay horses."

Al-Dînawârî, al-Akhbâr al-tiwâl, 111, mentions as ruling before Bûrân the child Juwânsîr, son of Khusrâw and Kûrdiyâh, the sister and wife of Bahram Chûbîn [see al-Ṭabarî, I, 998, 1001, pp. 309, 316–17 above], whom Abarwêz had married after Bahram's death; if this piece of information were true, presumably Juwânsîr would have escaped Shêrûy's massacre of his brothers, but in any case, must have died after a year. There is no trace of him in Sasanid coinage.

997. Nöledeke noted, trans. 391 n. 3, that Bûrân also built a fire temple at Istînîyâ (a village near the later al-Kûfah, according to Yaqût, Buldân, I, 176, pace Nöledeke that it was near Baghdad), according to al-Mas'ûdi, Murûj, IV, 86 = § 1412, cf. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 283.
intermediacy of the Catholicos called Ishū'hab. Her tenure of royal power lasted one year and four months.

Then there succeeded to the royal power after her a man called Jushnas Dih, from the remote offspring of Abarwiz's paternal uncle. His tenure of royal power was less than a month.

998. Restoration of the True Cross had been a prominent point in the peace negotiations begun by Heraclius with Shērōy and dragging on into the times of Shahrbaraz or Būrān, but the Cross was actually restored by Shērōy and was back in Jerusalem in late summer 629 or spring 630; see on the problem of exact dating here, n. 951 above. The Catholicos in question was Isho'yahb II of Gadala, formerly bishop of Balad in northern Mesopotamia and in office 628–46; hence he was head of the Nestorian Church when the Arabs arrived in Iraq. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 341, 343–44. Isho'yahb and several other Nestorian bishops of the Persian empire went on a mission to Heraclius in northern Syria as part of the peace negotiations. See Nöldeke, trans. 392 n. 1, Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 243–45.

999. In Nöldeke's surmise, trans. 433, there was a short interregnum of intrigues and anarchy in the capital Ctesiphon after Shahrbaraz's assassination on 9 June 630. Būrān's coins, extending over three regnal years, began with the regnal year 1, which would have ended on 16 June 630. Her reign must have extended over a year and four or six months, hence into autumn 631. The Anonymus Guidi, trans. 33, and the Nestorian Chronicle of Ser't state that she was strangled, according to the latter source, by the general Firūz. Būrān's name appears on her coins as BWL'N. See on her coins Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 69, 392–93, Plate XXII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table XIII, Plate 15; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 166–68; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238; Jenny Rose, "Three Queens, Two Wives, and a Goddess. The Roles and Images of Women in Sasanian Iran," 43–45.

The other Arabic sources for her reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666; al-Ya'qūbi, Ta'rikh, I, 197; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-tīwāl, 111; al-Masūdī, Murūj, II, 233 = § 654; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 147; Ḥamzah al-Īṣfahānī, Ta'rikh, 54; Ibn al-Athīr, Kamīl, I, 499. Of Persian sources, see Tabari-Ba'lam, tr. II, 349–50. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sasanides, 498; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians," 171, 178; EIr, s.v. Būrān [Marie Louise Chaumont].

1000. The form of this ephemeral ruler's name is uncertain, especially in regard to the second element after Jushnas/Gushnasp. variably written in those sources that mention him, i.e., Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666, "one of Kirdā's paternal uncle's progeny"; al-Masūdī, Murūj, II, 233–34 = § 654, Firūz J.sh.n.dah, a descendant of Shābūr, son of Yazdajird I [the Sinner”; idem, Tanbīh, tr. 147, Firūz J.sh.n.t.dah; Ibn al-Athīr, Kamīl, I, 499–500 [al-Dīnawarī's section on the Persian rulers ends essentially with Būrān, and merges into his account of the Arab conquests in Iraq and Persia]. The resemblance of the names given by al-Masūdī and Ibn al-Athīr to that of the Fayruz, son of Mihrān Jushnas who is listed by al-Ṭabarī, I, 1066, p. 408 below, leads one to think that the two persons are really one and the same.
Then there succeeded to the royal power Azarmidukht, daughter of Kísra (II) Abarwîz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of Kísra (I) Anûsharwân. It is said that she was one of the most beautiful of the women of the Persians and that she proclaimed, when she assumed the royal power, "Our way of conduct will be that of our father Kísra, the victorious one, and if anyone rebels against us, we will shed his blood." It is said that the outstanding great man of Persia was at that time Farrukh Hurmuz, Išbâbbadh of Khurâsân. He sent a message to her asking her to give herself in marriage to him. She wrote back, "Marriage to a queen is not permissible. I realize full well that your intention in what you are proposing is to satisfy your own [sexual] needs and lust with me; so come to me on such-and-such night." Azarmidukht ordered the commander of her guard to lie in wait for him on the night they had agreed to meet together and then kill him. The commander of her guard carried out her orders regarding Farrukh Hurmuz; and at her command, the latter's corpse was dragged out by the feet and thrown down in the open space before the palace of government. Next morning, they found Farrukh Hurmuz slain, and she gave orders for his corpse to be taken away and concealed from sight. It was generally recognized that he could only have been killed for some momentous deed. Rustam, son of Farrukh Hurmuz, the man whom Yazdajîrd (III) was later to send to combat the Arabs, was acting as his father's deputy in Khurâsân. When he received the news [i.e., of his father's murder], he came with a mighty army, encamped at al-Madā'in, blinded Āzarmīdukht, and then killed her. According to other authorities, however, she was poisoned. Her tenure of royal power was six months.\(^{1004}\)

[Kisrā III]

There was then brought forward a man from the stock of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak, who was living in al-Ahwāz, called Kisrā. [He was] the son of Mihr Jushnas. The great men of state raised him to the throne. He assumed the crown and sat down upon the royal throne, but was killed a few days after his accession.\(^{1005}\)

[Khurrazādh Khusraw]

It is also said that the one who reigned after Āzarmīdukht was Khurrazādh Khusraw, from the progeny of [Khusraw II] Abarwīz.\(^{1006}\) It is said that he was found in a fortress near Nišibīn called al-Ḥiṣārah (the “Stone Fortress”).\(^{1007}\) When he reached al-Madā'in, he remained there a few days only before [the people there] rebelled and rose against him in opposition.\(^{1066}\)

---

1004. Hence Āzarmīdukht’s reign was even shorter than that of her sister Būrān, and would fall at the end of 631 and opening of 632; see Nöldeke, trans. 434. Coins issued by her, one from the mint of Shīrāz, with the effigy of her father Khusraw Abarwīz and with the legend of her own name, have been discovered and identified by M. I. Mochiri. See Selwood, Whitting and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 169–70; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 238–39.

1006. There seems to be a confusion here of Khurrazādh and the Farrukhzādh mentioned below as coming after Firūz [II]. Al-Ya‘qūbi, Ta‘rikh, I, 198, does not mention Khurrazāzh (nor do any other sources) but places Farrukhzāzh after Firūz.

Those authorities who say that Kisra (III), son of Mihr Jushnas, succeeded to the royal power after Azarmidukht [further relate that,] when Kisra, son of Mihr Jushnas, was killed, the great men of state in Persia sought for someone from the royal house whom they could raise to the throne. They looked for someone who had in his veins an element of [the blood of] the members of that house, even though it was through maternal relationship. They brought forward a man who was resident in Maysan, called Fayruz, son of Mihran Jushnas, who was also called Jushnas Dih.\textsuperscript{1008} He was the son of Shahabukht,\textsuperscript{1009} daughter of Yazdandadh (text, "Yazdandar"), son of Kisra (I) Anusharwan. They raised him to the throne against his own will. He was a man with a large head, and when he was crowned he exclaimed, "How tight this crown is!" The great men of state drew a bad omen from his beginning his reign by speaking of tightness and narrowness, hence killed him after he had reigned for [only] a few days. Some people assert that he was killed the moment he uttered those words.\textsuperscript{1010}

Farrukhzadh Khusraw

The authorities who say this last go on to say that a man from among the great men of state, called Zadhi,\textsuperscript{1011} who had the func-

\textsuperscript{1008} As noted in n. 1000 above, this Fayruz may well be identical with the Jushnas Dih mentioned in al-Tabari, I, 1064, p. 405 above; at least, there is some confusion in the sources which seem to mention Fayruz, i.e., al-Yaqubi, \textit{Ta'rikh}, I, 198, al-Mas'udi, \textit{Muqti}, II, 233–34 = § 654 (I); Ibn al-Athir, \textit{Kamil}, I, 500.

\textsuperscript{1009} Written thus here and in Ibn al-Athir, loc. cit., but reflecting the common rendering in Arabic of Persian \textit{ch} by \textit{s}, cf. Siddiqi, \textit{Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter}, 72, hence probably the name Chahar Bukht, "saved by the four," i.e., the four spirits of water, earth, plants, and beasts, or the four elements, cf. the common Sasanid name Si Bukht, "saved by the three." See Nöldeke, trans. 396 n. 1; Justi, \textit{Namenbuch}, 151; Gignoux, \textit{Noms propres sassanides}, no. 833. Fayruz's relationship to the main stem of the Sasanid royal house was clearly tenuous.

\textsuperscript{1010} In addition to the exiguous Arabic sources on Fayruz mentioned in n. 1008 above, see the Persian one of Tabari-Bal'ami, tr. II, 352–53. See also Nöldeke, trans. 396 n. 1. No coins of his seem to be extant.

\textsuperscript{1011} Thus written in the text, but taken by Nöldeke, trans. 396 and n. 2, as Zadhuyah, which seems likely. Nöldeke also noted that the Marzbân of Sarakhs who made peace with 'Abdallah b. 'Amir in 31/651–52 when the Arabs arrived in tion of "Chief of the Servants" [ra'is al-khawal], proceeded to a place in the western section [of the Persian kingdom], near to Nisibin, called Hisn al-Hijarah ("the Stone Fortress"). He brought back a son of Kiswa's who had escaped to that fortress when Shiryah killed all the sons of Kiswa, and who was called Farrukhzadh Khusraw, to the city of Ctesiphon. The people gave him obedience for a short time, but then rebelled and rose in opposition against him. Some sources state that they killed him. His period of royal power was six months.

[Yazdagird III]

Some authorities say that the people of Iṣṭakhr got hold of Yazdagird, son of Shahriyar, son of Kiswa, at Iṣṭakhr, whither people had fled with him when Shiryah killed his brothers.
When the great men of state among the people of Ištakhr received the news that the people of al-Madā’in had rebelled against Farrukhzādh, they brought Yazdajird to a fire temple called “Ardashir’s fire temple,” crowned him there and hailed him as king. He was, however, only a young boy. Then they brought him to al-Madā’in and killed Farrukhzādh Khusraw by means of treachery after he had reigned for one year. In this fashion, the way was open for Yazdajird to assume the royal power, except that, compared with the power of his forefathers, his power was like a phantom of the imagination and a vision in a dream (al-khayāl wa-al-ḥulm). The great men of state and the ministers exercised his royal authority because of his youth. The most illustrious and the shrewdest of his ministers was the Chief of the Servants. The power of the Persian kingdom grew weak, and its enemies attacked it boldly from all sides, made incursions into Yazdajird’s lands, and devastated parts of them. The Arabs attacked his lands when two years had elapsed of his reign or, it is said alternatively, after four years. His whole life span, until he was killed, was twenty-eight years.

from the start because his mother had been a mere cupper (ḥaffāmah) in Khusraw Abarwēz’s service, but was brought out from obscurity from sheer necessity; cf. al-Ṭabari’s information, I, 1044, p. 380 above, on Yazdagird’s mother). Nöldeke, trans. 397 n. 3, 434, that Yazdagird’s accession must have fallen within the Persian year 16 June 632–16 June 633, since the Zoroastrians begin their era in this year of Yazdagird III’s accession.

1015. That is, the fire temple at Jūr/Firuzābād whose building by Ardashir I is recorded in al-Ṭabari, I, 817, p. 11 above.

1016. Nöldeke, trans. 397 n. 5, noted that Yazdagird had considerable trouble in establishing his authority throughout all the Persian lands, with important provinces like Azerbaijan, Mesopotamia, and Khurāsān at first reluctant to acknowledge him. Al-Dinawarī, al-Akhbar al-tiwal, 119, speaks of his struggles when raised to the throne (but anachronistically, it would appear, with Azarmīgdukt). It seems that Rustam threw his weight behind the new king in the short period before he became embroiled with the invading Arabs. Numismatic evidence [see n. 1013 above] shows the existence of a rival for the throne, Hormizd [V], who challenged Yazdagird’s position and whose center of power Armenian sources place in Nisibin in Upper Mesopotamia.

1017. Yazdagird III ruled from the end of 632 or the beginning of 633 till his death at Marw in 31/651 (al-Ṭabari, I, 2872–84, tr. R. S. Humphreys, The History of al-Ṭabari, an Annotated Translation, XV, The Crisis of the Caliphate. The Reign of ‘Uthmān, 78–90). The Arabs began their probes into Iraq by the end of the second year of his reign, i.e., in 634 or 635, with the major battle for the province coming a year or two later. Yazdagird’s name appears on coins as YZDKRTY. See
There are various further historical reports about this ruler Yazdajird and his sons, which I will mention later, if God wills, in their appropriate place, including the conquests by the Muslims of the land of the Persians, and what was the ultimate fate of Yazdajird and his sons.1018 on his coins, Paruck, Sasanian Coins, 70, 394-96, 494-95, Plate XXXI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54-55, Table XIII, Plate 15; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 175-78; Malek, “A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics,” 240.

The other Arabic sources on Yazdagird’s accession and first few years include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma‘ārif, 666-67; al-Ya‘qubī, Ta‘rikh, I, 198; al-Dinawari, al-Akhbār al-tiwal, 119; al-Mas‘ūdi, Murūj, II, 234 = § 655; idem, Tanbih, 103, trans. 147; Hamzah al-Ifshānī, Ta‘rikh, 53; Ibn al-‘Athīr, Kāmil, I, 501. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal‘amī, trans. II, 353, who merely quotes the fact of Yazdagird’s accession and that he reigned for four years, i.e., this source regards his reign as closing with the Arabs’ capture of the capital al-Mada‘īn in March 637 and Yazdagird’s subsequent gradual retreat eastward across Persia from Hulwān and Ifshān to ʾĪṣṭakhr (thus according to such Arabic sources as al-Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 315; al-Ṭabarī, I, 439-40, tr. The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation. XIII. The Conquest of Iraq, Southwestern Persia and Egypt. The Middle Years of ‘Umar’s Caliphate, 20; the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 33, has Yazdagird flee via Khūzistān) to Kirmān and then his being killed in Khurāsān. Of modern studies, see Nöldeke, trans. 397 nn. 3-5, 431; Frye, The Golden Age of Persia. The Arabs in the East, London 1975, 57-67; Abd al-Ḥusain Zarrinkub, “The Arab Conquest of Iran and Its Aftermath,” 4, 12-25.

1018 One of Yazdagird’s sons, Firūz (III), spent the rest of his life after his father’s death on the far northeastern fringes of the Islamic lands. He seems to have received aid from the Hephthalite or Turkish local ruler of Bactria/Touchharistan, and may, in the surmise of J. Harmatta, have held power in Sistan for a short period ca. 660. He became a Chinese vassal and hoped to make a comeback with Chinese help, but he was driven out of the upper Oxus region by the Arabs, subsequently made his way to the imperial capital Ch’ang-an and died in China. Firūz’s son, whose name is known only from Chinese sources as Ni-nieh-shih (presumably Narseh) continued to hover round the regions of Sogdia and Taḥkharistan, stirring up trouble against the Arabs, but China was too distant to give these Sasanid claimants any effective military support; he had to fall back into China and died there soon after 707. The presence of Sasanid descendants in the Chinese capital Ch’ang-an seems nevertheless to be attested, according to Chinese sources, into the ninth century. See Marquart, Erânsahr, 68, 133-34; J. Harmatta, “The Middle Persian-Chinese Bilingual Inscription from Hsian and the Chinese-Sasanian Relations,” 373-76; Frye, “The Political History,” 176; W. Watson, “Iran and China,” 547.
The whole of the period of years that elapsed from Adam’s being sent down to earth (i.e., his expulsion from the Garden of Eden) up to the time of the Prophet’s Hijrah, according to what the Jews among the People of the Book say and according to what they allege is in the all-embracing text of the Torah (al-Tawrāt al-ṣūrah) setting forth the lives of the prophets and kings, is 4,642 years and a few months.\textsuperscript{1019}

According to what the Christians say and assert in their Torah in the Greek language (i.e., the Septuagint), that extent of time was 5,992 years and a few months.

With regard to the whole of that, according to what the Persian Zoroastrians say, it was 4,182 years, ten months, and nineteen days, with the proviso that included in that span is the period of time between the Hijrah and the killing of Yazdajird—that is, thirty years, two months and fifteen days—and the further proviso that this system of reckoning of theirs and the beginning of their era (ta’rikh) runs from the time of Jayūmart, Jayūmart being Ādām [Adam], the progenitor of all mankind, to whom every human being can be traced back, as I have clearly set forth in this book.

Concerning the learned scholars of Islam, I have mentioned previously what certain of them have said regarding it, and I shall now mention some of those whose fame has not come down to the present day. These persons say that from the time of Ādām to that of Nūḥ (Noah) was ten centuries (a century, qarn, being a hundred years), between Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm (Abraham), ten centuries (a century being a hundred years again) and between Ibrāhīm and Mūṣā, son of ʿImrān (Moses, son of Amram), ten centuries (a century being a hundred years yet again).

\textsuperscript{1019} In n. a to his text, Nöldeke cited the origin of this phrase as Syriac ʂurat ƙotāb “the complete text of the sacred books.”

Mention of Those Who Say That

There related to us Ibn Bashshār—Abū Dāwūd—Hamām b. Qatādah—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās, who said: Between Ādām and Nūḥ there were ten centuries, and all of them (i.e., the people of this period) followed a path of divine truth (šarīʿah min al-ḥaqq).

There related to us al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. Wāqid al-Aslāmī,1020 from several of the learned scholars, who all said: Between Ādām and Nūḥ were ten centuries (a century being a hundred years), between Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm, ten centuries (a century being a hundred years again), and between Ibrāhīm and Mūṣā, son of ʿImrān, ten centuries (a century being a hundred years yet again).

It was transmitted from ʿAbd al-Rahmān b. Mahdī—Abū ʿAwānāh—ʿĀsim al-ʿArqal—Abū ʿUthmān—Salmān, who said: The interval (al-fatrah) between Muḥammad and ʿĪsā (Jesus), peace be upon them both, was six hundred years.1021

It was transmitted from Fudayl b. ʿAbd al-Wahhab—Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān—ʿAwf, who said: Between ʿĪsā and Mūṣā was 600 years.

1020. That is, the historian al-Wāqidi (130–207/747–823), who derived this nisbah from his grandfather's name and that of al-Aslāmī from being a mawla of a member of the Medinan clan of Aslam. Of his many works on the pre-Islamic history of Mecca and Medina and on early Islamic history, only the Kitāb al-maghdūzī and possibly a Kitāb al-riddah survive, but his work was much used by slightly later authors such as Ibn Saʿd. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97; EP, s.v. al-Wāqidi [S. Leder].

1021. The literal meaning of fatrah is “relaxation, weakening,” thence “elapsing, period of time,” and the term is especially applied in early Islamic usage to the interval between any two of the numerous prophetic messengers (rasūl) who preceded the advent of Muḥammad. Al-Jāḥiẓ explained that these intervals were called fatrahās because there was a “slackening” of observance, with a reinvigoration of religion when a new rasūl came along. It became particularly used, as here, for the lengthy period without any prophets between Jesus and Muḥammad. See EP, s.v. Fatrah (Ch. Pellat), and n. 1025 below.
There related to me Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Saʿīd b. Abī Ṣadaqah—Muḥammad b. Sīrīn, who said: I was informed that Ka'b said that God's words, "O sister of Hārūn [Aaron]" do not refer to Hārūn the brother of Mūsā. 1022 He related: 'Ā'ishah said to him, "You are wrong!" He replied, "O Mother of the Faithful! If the Prophet said it, then he is the most knowledgeable and the best one, 1023 but if not, I find a space of six hundred years between them." He related: She was thereupon silent.

There related to me al-Hārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: Between Mūsā, son of ʿImrān, and Ḥisām b. Sā'īd, son of Maryam [Mary], was nineteen hundred years, but there was no interval (fatrah) between them, because during this period, God sent a thousand prophets from the Banū Isrāʾīl (Children of Israel), apart from those whom He sent to other nations. Between the birth of Ḥisām and the Prophet was 569 years, in the first part of which He sent three prophets, as in His words, "When We sent to them two persons, and they branded them as liars, We strengthened them with a third person"; 1024 the person whom He sent as a strengthener was Shamʿūn (Simon), one of the Apostles. The interval during which God did not send any prophets was 434 years. 1025 When Jesus was raised up (i.e., in his 1022. Qurʾān, XIX, 29/28, there being an apparent confusion here of Maryam, the Virgin Mary, with Maryam, the sister of Moses and Aaron. However, J. M. Rodwell in his The Koran Translated from the Arabic, 385 n. 2, admitted that Muhammad seems here to be guilty of an anachronism, but further pointed out that the anachronism might be only apparent, since even if Aaron, the brother of Moses, is meant, Maryam, the Virgin Mary, could be called his sister because she was of Levitical stock. Ka'b [i.e., Ka'b al-Aḥbār, on whom see n. 371 above] is in this tradition implying that the Hārūn/Aaron here is another person. See the extensive discussion in R. Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, 65.

---

1023. For the Leiden text's khayr, the Cairo text, II, 216, has, following al-Ṭabarī's Tafsīr, the reading akhbar "giving more faithful reports."

1024. Qurʾān, XXXVI, 13/14. The words occur at the opening of the parable, or rather, story, of the unbelieving town, Antioch being the city commonly identified with this. K. Ahrens referred to a story of St. Peter at Antioch given in Ps.-Clement of Alexandria, see Bell, A Commentary on the Qurʾān, II, 138–39. Muslim tradition came to connect the story of the unbelieving town with the legendary character Ḥabib the Carpenter who urged the town's inhabitants not to reject the three messengers who had been sent to them by God. See EP, s.v. Ḥabib al-Nadīǧār (G. Vajda).

1025. We thus have an attempt to fill up part at least of the fatrah between Jesus Ascension to Heaven), he was thirty-two years and six months old, and his period of prophethood was thirty months. God raised him [to Heaven] corporeally, and he is still alive at this moment.

There related to me Muhammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar—Ismā’il b. ‘Abd al-Karīm—‘Abd al-Šamad b. Ma‘qil, who heard Wahb [b. Munabbih] say that fifty-six hundred years have elapsed of this present world.

This is what was transmitted from the learned scholars of Islam concerning this, and in what they say there is a very wide variation. This is seen in the fact that al-Wāqīḍi told the story, on the authority of a group of learned scholars, that they said what I have mentioned as his transmission from them. On the basis of what he said, one must take the whole span of years of this present world up to the birth of our Prophet as being forty-six years, but on the basis of what Ibn ‘Abbās said, as transmitted by Hishām b. Muhammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ‘Abbās, one must take the figure up to the birth of the Prophet as fifty-five hundred years.

As for Wahb b. Munabbih, he mentioned what he had to say in one bloc, without breaking it down into details, that is, up to his own time [is a span of] fifty-six hundred years. The entire extent in time of this present world is, according to Wahb, six thousand years, of which there had elapsed up to his own time, in his view, fifty-six hundred years. Wahb b. Munabbih died in the year 114 of the Hijrah [A.D. 732].

Thus the remainder of the extent of this present world, from the time we are actually in now, is, according and Muḥammad; other Muslim scholars endeavored to find also within it persons who had at least rejected the worship of idols and had followed an ascetic way of life, such as the hanifs in pre-Islamic Mecca and the poet-ascetic of al-Ṭā’if, Um-ayyah b. Abī al-Šalt [on whom see n. 603 above], called collectively the ahl al-fatrah. See EP, s.v. Fatra [Ch. Pellat].

1026. This is one of the two dates given in the sources for Wahb’s death, the other being 110/728–29. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 305; EP, s.v. Wahb b. Munabbih [R. G. Khoury].
to Wahb’s words, 215 years.\footnote{1027} This is what Wahb b. Munabbih says, conformable to what Abū Ṣāliḥ transmitted from Ibn ‘Abbās. Some authorities state that from the time of the descent [to earth] of Ādām to the mission of our Prophet is 6,113 years, [this span comprising,] in their view, from Ādām’s descent to the earth up to the Flood, 2,256 years; from the Flood to the birth of Ibrāhīm, the Friend of the Merciful One,\footnote{1028} 1,079 years; from the birth of Ibrāhīm to Mūsā’s exodus with the Banū Īsā’īl from Egypt, 565 years; from Mūsā’s exodus with the Banū Isrāʾīl from Egypt to the building of the Sacred Temple (al-Bayt al-Magdis)—this being four years after the accession to royal power of Sulaymān, son of Dāwūd [Solomon, son of David]—636 years; from the building of the Temple to al-Iskandar’s [Alexander the Great’s] accession to royal power, 717 years; from al-Iskandar’s accession to the birth of ‘Īsā, son of Maryam, 369 years; from the birth of ‘Īsā to Muḥammad’s mission, 551 years; and from Muḥammad’s mission to his Hijrah from Mecca to Medina, thirteen years.

Some authorities have related from Hīšām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbi—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ‘Abbās, who said that from Ādām to Nūḥ was twenty-two hundred years; from Nūḥ to Ibrāhīm, 1,143 years; from Ibrāhīm to Mūsā, 575 years; from Mūsā to Dāwūd, 179 years; from Dāwūd to ‘Īsā, 1,053 years; and from ‘Īsā to Muḥammad, 600 years.

Al-Haytham b. ‘Adi\footnote{1029} has related from certain members of the People of the Book, saying that from Ādām to the Flood was 2,256 years; from the Flood to the death of Ibrāhīm, 1,020 years; from Ibrāhīm’s death to the Banū Isrāʾīl’s entry into Egypt, seventy-five years; from Yaʿqūb’s [Jacob’s] entry into Egypt to Moses’ exodus from it, 430 years; from the building of the Sacred Temple to the accession to royal power of Bukht-Naṣṣar [Nebuchadnezzar] and \footnote{1027. That is, the period of time between Wahb’s death and the date when al-Ṭabarî was writing his History, which would bring the latter date up to 319 [931].}

\footnote{1028. Ibrāhīm/Abraham being called in Muslim lore Khalîl Allâh, the “Friend of God,” this being based on Qurʾān, IV, 124/125 “and God took Abraham as a friend,” echoing Isa. xli. 8.}

\footnote{1029. That is, the Kūfān akhbār or historian [d. 204, 207 or 209/819–24], a source for al-Yaʿqūbî, al-Ṭabarî, al-Masʿūdî, and other historians. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 272; EP, s.v. al-Haytham b. ‘Adi (Ch. Pellat).}
the destruction of the Sacred Temple,\textsuperscript{1030} 446 years; from the accession of Bukht-Naṣṣar to the accession to royal power of al-Iskandar,\textsuperscript{1031} 436 years; and from al-Iskandar’s accession to the year 206 of the Hijrah \slashtext{[A.D. 821–822]}, 1,245 years.

\textsuperscript{1030} The Old Testament Nebuchadnezzar \textit{(nbwkdn'yr}, a scribal error in the masoretic text for \textit{nbwkdrʾyr}, Babylonian Nabû-kudurri-uṣur, “the god Nabu has guarded the estate [succession],” came to power in 605 B.C., various dates, including 588, 587, and 586 B.C. are given for his sack of Jerusalem and destruction of the Temple there. The extents of time between the events delineated here, going up to Alexander’s accession (see below) are, of course, fanciful.

\textsuperscript{1031} That is, Alexander the Great \textit{(365–323 B.C.)}, whose accession to the throne of Macedon took place in 336 B.C. on his father Philip II’s assassination. Al-Ṭabarī’s computation of 1,245 years is thus an exaggeration, even if \textit{hijrī} lunar years and not solar ones are used.
Primary Sources: Texts and Translations al-Azraqī, Abū al-Walīd Muḥammad b. ‘Abdallāh. Kitāb akhbār Makkah, ed. F. Wüstenfeld as Geschichte und Beschreibung der Stadt Mekka, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, Leipzig, 1858,

Bibliography of Cited Works

Bibliography of Cited Works

424 Bibliography of Cited Works

al-Ya'qūbī, Abū al-'Abbās Aḥmad b. Ishāq, called Ibn Wādīḥ. Kitāb albuldān, ed. M. J. de Goeje, BGA VII. Leiden, 1892. French trans. G.
Yāqūt, Abū 'Abdallāh Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥamawi al-Rūmī. Mu'jam al-Zabīdī, Muḥammad Murtadā. Tāj al-ʿarūs min jawāhir al-Qāmūs, 10

Secondary Sources and Reference Works

Abbott, Nabia. Two Queens of Baghdad. Mother and Wife of Hārūn al-Rashīd. Chicago, 1946.
Abdesselem, Mohamed. Le thème de la mort dans la poésie arabe de la mort des origines à la fin du IIIe/IXe siècle. Publications de l’Université de Tunis, Faculté des Lettres et des Sciences Humaines, 6th sér.: Al-Ansary, A. R. Qaryat al-Fau. A Portrait of Pre-Islamic Civilisation in Altheim, F., and R. Stiehl. Die Araber in der Alten Welt. II. Bis zur Reichstrennung. V/1. Weitere Neufunde—Nordafrika bis zur Ein-Al-Wohaibi, Abdullah. The Northern Hijaz in the Writings of the Arab Andrae, Tor. Die Person Muhammeds in Lehre und Glauben seiner Ge-
The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Barthold, W. Four Studies on the History of Central Asia. III. A History of the Turkmen People, English trans. V. and T. Minorsky. Leiden, ———. Turkestan Down to the Mongol Invasion, 3d ed. with an additional chapter . . . and with further Addenda and Corrigenda by C. E.

Bartholomae, Chr. Altiranisches Wörterbuch. Strassburg, 1904.

Bibliography of Cited Works

Blachère, R. "Ḥijāratun min sijjil," forthcoming in AO.

Bosworth, C. E. "The Terminology of the History of the Arabs in the Jāhiliyya, according to Khwārazmī's 'Keys of the Sciences,'" in *Studies in Juda-

428 Bibliography of Cited Works

Christensen, A. Romanen om Bahrám Tsch6bin, et rekonstruktionsforsøg. Copenhagen, 1907.
——. L'Iran sous les Sassanides, 2d enlarged ed. Copenhagen, 1944.

Gaube, H. Die südpersische Provinz Arraḡān/Kūh-Gilūyeh von der arabischen Eroberung bis zur Safawidenzeit. Analyse und Auswertung
Bibliography of Cited Works

——. "Le voile de la Ka’ba," SI 2 [1954]: 5–21.

Bibliography of Cited Works

Henning, W. B. “Neue Materialen zur Geschichte des Manichäismus,” ZDMG 90 (1936): 1–18.
Repr. in Henning, Collected Papers. Acta Iranica, deuxième série, Herrmann, Georgina. The Iranian Revival. The Making of the Past. Oxford, 1977.
Herzfeld, E. Paikuli. Monument and Inscriptions of the Early History of the Sasanian Empire, 2 vols. Berlin, 1924.
The Chronology, with a Brief History of the Persian Calendar.
Catholic University of America. Byzantine Studies I. Washington, D.C., 1939.
Hinz, W. Islamische Masse und Gewichte umgerechnet ins metrische
———. “Mani and Kardër,” in Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei. Problem Howard-Johnston, J. “The Two Great Powers in Late Antiquity: A Comparison," in The Byzantine and Early Islamic Near East. III. States, Resources and Armies, ed. Averil Cameron. Papers of the Third Workshop on Late Antiquity and Early Islam = Studies in Late Anti-Humbach, H., and Skjaervø, P.O. The Sassanian Inscription of Paikuli.
Part I. Supplement to Herzfeld’s Paikuli [Humbach]. Part III. 1. Text [Humbach]. Part III. 2. Commentary [Skjaervø]. Wiesbaden and 81.
Jeffery, A. The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur‘an. The Gaekwad’s Oriental Series LXXXIX. Baroda, 1938.
Justi, F. Iranisches Namenbuch. Marburg, 1895.
Juwaidah, Wadie. The Introductory Chapters of Yaqūt’s Mu‘jam al-
Bibliography of Cited Works

Krenkow, F. “The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore,” IC 2 [1928]: 55-89, 204-36.

—. “L’avènement des Marwānîdes et le califat de Marwān Ier,” MUSI 12 [1927]: 44-147.

Lane, E. W. An Arabic-English Lexicon, Derived from the Best and Most Copious Oriental Sources . . . , 8 parts. London, 1863-93.

Le Strange, G. Palestine under the Moslems. A Description of Syria and the Holy Land from A.D. 650 to 1500. London, 1890.

Løkkegaard, F. Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, with Special Reference to Circumstances in Iraq. Copenhagen, 1950.

436 Bibliography of Cited Works

Bibliography of Cited Works

Bibliography of Cited Works

Bibliography of Cited Works

The index contains proper names of persons, places, and tribal and other groups, as well as topographical data, occurring in the text (and sometimes in the footnotes also), together with technical terms; where the latter are explained in the footnotes, they are also noted.

The definite article al-, the abbreviation b. (for ibn “son”) and bt. (for bint “daughter”) and everything in parentheses have been disregarded for purposes of alphabetization.

A

Abarsam, Sasanid chief minister, 9, 12
Abarshahr, 15, 136
'Abbas the squinter, Arab raider, 300
'Abdallah b. 'Abbas, rawi, 414
'Abdallah b. 'Abd al-Mu'talib, father of the Prophet Muhammed, 161, 268, 283
'Abdallah b. al-Harith, the Prophet's foster-brother, 271
'Abdallah b. al-Thamir, of Najran, 192, 200–202, 204, 206
'Abd Kulal b. Muthawwib, king in Yemen, 124

'Abd al-Masih b. 'Amr al-Ghassani, 286–88
'Abd al-Qays Banū, 51, 55, 65, 291–92
'Abd al-Rahman b. Abī Bakrah, rawi, 336
'Abd al-'Uzza b. Imrī al-Qays al-Kalbi, poet, 76–79
'Abid b. al-Ajram, Banū, of Quḍā'ah, 33
Abkhaz, 153
Abrahah, Abū Yaksūm al-Ashram, Abyssinian governor in Yemen, 164, 207, 212–35, 242, 244, 266
Abruwan, town on the Persian Gulf shores of Fārs, 51, 105
Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq, caliph, 326
Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh, rawi, 327
Abū Kalbah al-Qaysi, poet, 368–69
Index

al-'Aqiq, Wādi, at Yathrib, 172
'Aqr Babil, palace in Iraq, 378
Aramaeans, al-Aramāniyyun, 19 and n. 70
Ardashīr I, son of Bābak, Sāsānīd emperor, 2–20, 23–27, 40, 87
Ardashīr II, son of Ḥurrūmūz II, Sāsānīd emperor, 66–68
Ardashīr III, son of Shirūyah, ephemeral Sāsānīd emperor, 400–402
Ardashīr's fire temple at Jūr or Firūzābād, 11, 410
Ardashīr Khurrah or Jar or Firūzābād, 10–12, 51, 105, 112, 116, 130, 382
Ardawān, Artabanus IV, Arsacid emperor, 8, 11, 13–14, 18–20, 22
Ardawānīs, Nabataeans of Syria, 19
Arīsh, forebear of Bahram Jubin, 309
Arjābdh, castellan, 6 and n. 15, 104
Armenia, 14, 95, 147, 151, 153, 306, 321
Arrajān, Bāqūbādū, Wām Qubādī, 12, 130, 137–38
Arsacids, al-Ashakāniyyah, 1 n. 1, 23–24
Aryāt, Abū Ṣahām (? Arethas), Abyssinian commander, 207–209, 212–15, 232, 236
Asad al-Quraṭī, Jewish rabbi of Yathrib, 166 al-Aswād b. Maqṣūd or Maṭṣūd, Abyssinian commander, 224 al-Aswād b. al-Mundhīr I, Lakhmid ruler, 126, 162 al-Aswād b. al-Mundhīr IV, Lakhmid, 340, 345
'Ātā' al-Khurāsānī, tāwī, 327
'Atm and Yām, Yemeni tribes, 172
'Atwadah, 'Ātūdah, slave of Abrahah, 215–16
'Awf, Banū, 167
Aws b. Qallīlam, governor of al-Ḥīrah, 74
'Āyn al-Tamr, place in Iraq, 36
Aywān Kirsā or Ṭaq-i Kirsā, at al-Madā'in, 285, 287–88, 332, 335
Āzādh Firūz, son of Jushnas, called al-Muka'bīr, 290–93
Āzādhbih, son of [Adhūr] Māhān (?), Persian governor, 372
Āzarmūdūkht, daughter of Khusrāw II Abarwīz, ephemeral Sāsānīd empress, 399, 406–408

B

Bā Janna, Beth Garme, district in Iraq, 32, 58
Bāb al-Abwīb, al-Bāb, Darband, the Caspian Gates, 162, 299
Bābā, king of the Aramaeans, 19–20
Bābak, son of 'l-y.r.mān (?), head of the Persian army department, 262–63
Bābak, son of Sāsān, 5, 8
Bādarāyā, district of Iraq, 254
Bādhgīs, 299, 302
Bādhān, Persian governor in Yemen, 252, 331, 375
badrah, purse, 377 and n. 935
Bāgh al-Hinduwīn, garden at al-Madā'in, 379
Bahram I, son of Sabur I, Sasanid emperor, 43, 45
Bahram II, son of Bahram I, Sasanid emperor, 46
Bahram III, son of Bahram II, Sakanshah and Sasanid emperor, 47
Bahram IV, son of Sabur II, Kirman-Shah and Sasanid emperor, 69
Bahram V Jur or Gur, son of Yazdajird I, 75, 82-106
Bahram VI, son of Jushnas, known as Bahram Jubin or Chubin, 301-304, 306-307, 338
Bahram, son of Siyawush, commander of Bahram Jubiin, 310-11 al-Balayn, 15-16, 51, 54-55, 63, 253, 290, 347, 372
Bahurasur, Bahrasir, town of al-Mada'in, 118, 176
Bakr b. Wail, Banu, 55-56, 65, 289, 339-63, 366
Baku'saya, district of Iraq, 254
Balanzar, people of the Caucasus region, 151, 153
Balash, Walash, son of Yazdajird II, Sasanid emperor, 126-28, 130
Balash, Walash, local king in Kirmân, 9-10
Balashawadh or Sibat, town, 127
Balkh, 15, 99, 160
Band-i Qaysar, the "emperor's dam," 30 n. 94
banjakân, five-arrow volley, 247 and n. 600
Banu al-Ahrar, "the Free Ones," name for the Persians, 367, 369 baqâyâ, arrears of land tax, 99 and n. 253, 376, 404
Baqi al-Charqad, at Yathrib, 172
Baraz, head of the Christians in Ahwâz, 255
barid, postal and intelligence system, 50 and n. 147, 328
Bariq, fortress in Iraq, 361
Bâriz, people in Kirmân, 150

Basak (?), son of Mâhbu'dh, 291
al-Bayda', town in Fars, 6
Baynîn, fortress in Yemen, 209
Bazranjin family of Fars, 4-5
Bih Ardashir or the western side of al-Mada'in, 15-16, 61, 87-88, 376
Bihrasir, district of Iraq, 15
Bil, indicator of the site for Junday Sâbûr, 38-39
Bilqis, queen in Saba', 174
al-Binajân (?), son of al-Marzubân, son of Wahriz, 252
Bindüyeh, Bindi, uncle of Khusraw Abarwiz, 303-304, 307, 309-11, 313
Bint al-Qârin, of Shaybân, poetess, 365
Bishtâsib, Gushtasp, legendary Iranian ruler, 390
Bistâm, Ishbahbadh, 91
Bistam, uncle of Khusraw Abarwiz, 303-304, 307, 309-10, 313
B.n. du (?), king of Maysân, 13
B.n.j.r, people of the Caucasus region, 151, 153
the Bosphorus, al-khalif, 327
'b.râs.yâr, tax arrangement, 260 and n. 626
B.r.mudhat, son of Shabah, ruler of the Turks
Bukayr, the Deaf One of the Banû al-Hârith b. 'Ubâd, poet, 367-68
Bukht Naşar, Nebuchadnezzar, 22, 417
Buqaylah, Banu, of Ghassân, 286, 349
Bûrân(dukht), daughter of Khusraw Abarwiz, 399, ephemeral Sasanid empress, 403-405
Burd b. Ḣârîthah al-Yashkurî, 365-66
Burjân, the Bulghars of the Middle Volga region, 161-62
Buşrâ, 270, 282, 327
buzurg framadhar, buzurjfarmadhar, chief minister among the later Sasanids, 9 and n. 29, 99, 105
Buzurj Sabûr, 'Ukbarâ, town in Iraq, 56
Index

Byzantium, the Byzantines, 28, 299, 304, 317–18, 320, 324–27, 378, 394, 400, 404. See also the Romans, al-Rûm

Caucasus Mountains, 99
China, Chinese, 143–44, 160, 177
Constantinople, al-Quslintaniyyah, 58, 103, 143, 319, 321, 376
Ctesiphon, 14, 52, 60–61, 87–88, 97, 118, 304, 377, 401, 409

D
Dâdhbundadh, secretary of Ardawân, 14
al-Danaq (l), plain in Azerbaijan, 313
Dâniyâl, Daniel, the Prophet, 57
Dârâ, son of Bahman, 3
Dârâ, local ruler in Fârs, 7
Dârâ, town in Upper Mesopotamia, 254
Dârín, place in eastern Arabia, 55
Dârâbjiird, 6–9
Dardistân, 150
Dasht-i Bârîn, plain in Fârs, 105
Daskarat al-Malik, town in Iraq, 322–23, 399 dâwâ, ink holder, 257 and n. 622
Daws, Jew of Najrân, 204
Daws Dhu Thâlâtân, 203, 206–208
Dawar, corps of troops in the Lakhmids’ service, 79
Dâwîd, King David, 187, 416
al-Daybul, in Sind, 107
Daylam, the Daylamis, 160

al-Dâyzar. See al-Sâṭîrûn
Dhât Tûmân, well of, 165
Dâ’b b. Hâjâr, tribal group in Yemen, 287
Dhu Jadan al-Hîmîyârî, poet, 208–10
Dhu al-Jaddayn, house of Râbî’âb, 356
Dhu Nafar al-Hîmîyârî, 221–22, 225
Dhu Nuwâs, Zur’âb b. Tubân As’âd
Abî Karîb, 190–91, 194–95, 202–207, 210–12
Dhu Qâr, Day of, Qurâqir, al-Hînî, etc., 338–39, 356, 358, 362–70
Dhu al-Qarnayn, 173
Dhu Ru’ayn al-Hîmîyârî, 184–86
Dhu Yazan, house of, in South Arabia, 182
Dih, man from Ardashir Khurrah, 112 dîhqân, Persian landholder, 396, 375
Dijjat al-Awrâr, “the Blind Tigris,” 331–35
Dinak, mother of Hurmuz II and Fayrûz-I, 109 dirâfsh-i Kâbiyân, the banner of Kâwah, 308 and n. 720 dîwân, government exchequer, 116–17 dîwânîyâh, dîwân rolls, 302
dîwân al-muqâṭtîlah, department of the army, 262 al-Duff, place in western Arabia, 168, 173
Dunbâwand, 147

E

Egypt, 416
Euphrates River, al-Furat, 80, 300, 210

F fâdâm, pandâm, cover over the mouth, 367 and n. 892 fâdhusbân, provincial civil governor, 146–7 and n. 375, 318, 321, 392, 395, 397
Index

Fahr (?), Chief Mōbadh, 9
Fāmiyah, Apamea, 254
Far'ah bt. Sa'd al-Tā'iyyah, wife of the Lakhmid al-Nu'mān III, 355
Farāz-marā-āwar-khudāyā, fire temple in southwestern Persia, 105
Farghānāh, 160
farr(ah), xwarrah, "royal glory," 88 n. 232
Farrukh Hurmuz, commander of Khusraw II Abarwiz, 313
Farrukh Hurmuz, Išbâladh of Khurāsān, 406
Farrukhzād, son of Sumayy, 376, 378
Farrukhzād Khusraw, son of Khusraw II Abarwiz, Sasanid emperor, 408-10
Fārs, 3-4, 12-13, 19, 54, 63, 285, 291-92, 313
Fāsā, 147
Fāsīn, local ruler in Fārs, 7
fatrah, the interval between prophets, 413 and n. 1021, 414 fay' al-riyah "plunder of the winds," 394
Faymiyūn, Christian ascetic of Najrān, 193-94, 196-200
Fayrūz, Firūz, Pērōz I, son of Yazdajird II, Sasanid emperor, 96, 107-21, 372
Fayrūz, Firūz, Pērōz II, son of Mihrān Jushnas and Sahārbukht, Sasanid emperor through the female line, 408
Fayrūz, minister of Shīrūyah, 398 Fayrūzdūkht, daughter of Fayrūz I, 119-20 al-Fayyūm, bridge of, 140
Fīrās, rāwī, 364
Fuḍayl b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, rāwī, 413
Fūqā, Phocas, Byzantine emperor, 317, 319
Fuqaym, Banū, of Mālik of Kinānah, 218, 221
Furūmīshā, probably Pulakesin II of the Chāluqya dynasty, king of India, 389-90
Fus Farrukh, 402-403

G
Ghālib b. Fihr, Banū, of Quraysh, 180-81
Ghassān, Ghassānids, 347, 349
Ghumān, fortress at Ṣan'ā', 209-10, 250

H al-Hadr, Hatra, 31, 34
Hāḍramawt, 245
Haftān bukht (?), local ruler in the Persian Gulf coastlands, 10
Hajar, 54, 56, 291-92
Ḥalīmah bt. Abī Dhu‘ayb, the Prophet Muḥammad’s foster-mother, 271-75 Hamadhān, 14, 372, 376
al-Hāmarz, Persian commander, 365-67
al-Hamīm b. 'Awf, Banū, 77
Ḥammād al-Rawiyāh, rāwī, 340
Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Prophet’s uncle, 272
Ḥānī b. Mas‘ūd al-Shaybānī, 356, 358-59, 361
Ḥānī b. Qabiṣah, 359, 363-64
Ḥanẓalah, Banū, 56
Ḥanẓalah b. Tha‘labah al-‘Ilī, 360-64, 366
Harāt, 299, 302
al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-‘Uzza, the Prophet’s foster-father, 271 al-Ḥārith (Arethas) b. Abī Shamīr, Ghassānīd, 333 al-Ḥārith b. ‘Amr Ākil al-Murār, ruler of Kindah, 161 and n. 408 al-Ḥārith b. ‘Amr al-Maqṣūr, ruler of Kindah, 125, 139-42 al-Ḥārith b. Māriyāḥ al-Ghassānī, Ibn Jafnah, Ghassānīd or Jafnid, 77-79 Harjand, son of Sām, 24
ḥarrās, volcanic regions of Arabia, 179 and n. 460, 181
Hārūn, Aaron, the Patriarch, 414
Index

‘ilj, “rough one, barbarian,” 78 and n. 210, 375, 378
Imru’ al-Qays I al-Bad’, Lakhmid, 44, 67
Imru’ al-Qays II b. ‘Amr b. Imri’ al-Qays I al-Bad’, 74–75
India, 100–102
Iram of Dhū Yazan, 180
Irān-Khurrah-Sābūr, or Karkh, 57
Irānsahr-Sābūr, town in Ahwāz, 65
‘Īsā, Jesus, the Messiah, 192, 196, 199, 202, 275, 413–14, 416
Isbabadh, provincial military governor, 91 and n. 237, 104, 131, 149, 303, 309, 401, 406
Iṣbahān, Iṣfahān, 12, 62, 313
Iṣhū’hab, Nestorian Christian catholicos, 405 al-Iskandar, Alexander the Great, 2–3, 416–17. See also Dhū al-Qarnayn Israel, Children of, 276, 414
Iṣṭakhr, 3–5, 8, 12, 15, 62, 235, 285, 292, 402, 409–10
Iṣṭakhr, fire temple at, 285
Iyād, Banū, 363
Izadh Jushnas, 307
J
al-Jabal, al-Jibāl, 14
Jabalah, Day of, 267
Jabbār (or Ḥayyān) b. Fayḍ, of Najrān, 203
Jābir b. Abjar al-Ijli, 364
Jadis, Banū, 122
Jafnah b. al-Nuʿmān al-Jāfni, Ghassānid, 347–8
Jahjabā b. ‘Atik b. Lakhm, 74
[al-] Jalābzin, Persian commander, 360–61, 363
Jāmāsib, Zāmāsib, son of Fayruz I, Säsānīd emperor, 133–36
Jarāmiqah, people of Bā Jarmā, 32
Jarib, measurement of surface area, 256 and n. 621, 258, 260–61
Jayhalah, mother of al-Dayzan, 32
Jayūmart, Kayūmart, the legendary first man, 390
al-Jazirah, 137
Jerusalem, al-Bayt al-Maqdis, 318, 416–17
Jilinūs, Jalinūs, Persian guard commander, 384–86
Jirih, place in Fārs, 13
jizyat al-jamājīm, poll tax, 255 and n. 619 jizyah, poll tax, 259–60 and n. 625 al-Jubābāt, 262–63
Jūbānān, place in Fārs, 7
al-Jubb, near Dhū Qār, 363
Judhāmah bt. al-Ḥārith, called Shaymā’, the Prophet Muhammad’s foster-sister, 271–72
Jumdān, place in western Arabia, 173
Junday Sabur, Jundishāpūr, Bih-az-Andiw-i Sābūr, 29, 38–39, 45, 64–65
Jūr. See Ardashir Khurrah
Jurash, in Yemen, 179
Jurhum, Banū, 169
Jurjān, Gurgān, 15, 73, 112, 153
Jushnas Dih, ephemeral Säsānīd emperor, 405
Juwānī, head of the Persian chancery, 88–89
Juwātābha, battle of, 372
Jūzhir, Juzhir, local ruler in Iṣṭakhr, 5–8
K
Kaʿb al-Aḥbār, ṭawī, 145
Kaʿb al-Qurāzī, Jewish rabbi in Yathrib, 166
Ka'bah, at Mecca, and its haram, 168–
70, 172–73, 177, 218, 221–24, 226–
28, 232–35, 266, 271, 281
Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription, 3 n. 5, 29
n. 93, 46 n. 137
Kābulistān, 150
kāhin, soothsayer, 175 and n. 445, 179, 279
Kālīn, Banū, 78
Kārazīn, place in the district of Ardabīl
Khartakh, place in the district of Ardashīr
Khurrah, 1130
Kard[n], son of Mihr Narsī, supreme commander of the army, 104–105
Kārdadhan, fire-temple of, 105
al-Karkhī al-Sūs, in Ahwāz, 65
Karkhī Maysān or Astādād Ardabīl, in Lower Iraq, 13, 16
Karūn river, here called the Dujayl, 12 al-kayiyyah, the qualities of Persian kingship, 41 and n. 127
Kāzarūn, in Fārs, 13
al-Kāzīmah, in eastern Arabia, 51
Kerdār, Chief Mōbed, 46 n. 137
Khālid b. Jābala, Ghassānid or Jafnīd,
252–53
Khālid b. 'Abd al-'Uzza, poet, 166–67
Khālid b. al-Walid, 372
khandaq, trench, 115
Khandaq, village of Bih-ARDABĪL, 376
Khānīqīn, in eastern Iraq, 357–58
Khāqān of the Turks, 94–99, 126, 128, 152–53, 160, 265, 307
khārāj, land tax, 255, 258, 261
Khath'am, Banū, 216, 222 al-Khāṭṭ or Pāsā (?), Ardabīl, town in eastern Arabia, 16, 54–55
Khātūn, wife of the Khāqān of the Turks, 98 and n. 251, 265, 318–17
al-Khawarmaq, palace of the Lakhmids, 75–76, 78, 81
al-Khayzurān, wife of the caliph al-
Mahdī, 269
Khazars, 59–60, 149, 160, 299
Khuñi Sābūr(?), town in Bājarma, 58
Khumāy, building of, 8
Khumāniyāh, village in the Sawād, 380
Khür, district near Iṣṭaqhr, 4
Khurāsān, 15, 28, 58, 99, 109–11, 113,
118, 149, 160, 313–14, 406
Khurramkhusrauh, son of al-Bīmājān, 252
Khurramkhusrauh, son of al-Muṣīnān,
375
Khurshidhrān, 310
Khusraw I Anūsharwān. See
Anūsharwān
Khusraw II Abarwīz. See Abarwīz
Khusraw, Kīrā II, son of Mihr Jushnas, ephemeral Sāsānīd emperor, 407–408
Khusraw Khurram-zādī, descendant of Khusraw II Abarwīz, ephemeral
Sāsānīd emperor, 407
Khusraw Shāh Qubādī, palace of, 401
Khuwaylid b. Wathīlah al-Hudhalī, 226
Khwāday-nāmag, Book of Kings, xix
Khwārzm, 15, 99
Kinānah, Banū, 219, 224, 226
Kindah, tribal group, 122
Kirmān, 9–10, 56, 65, 66, 69
kīswah, covering of the Ka'bah, 232 and n. 572
Kūjarān, district on the Persian Gulf coast of Fārs, 16
Kūn.s (?), place in Fārs, 7
kūrah, province, 15, 38, 43, 58, 254– 55
Kūrdī, brother of Bahram VI Jūbīn,
304, 308–309, 313
Kurdīyāh, sister of Bahram VI Jūbīn,
309, 316–17
Kurds, 11
Kūsa', the proverbial man of, 345
Kūshāns, 15
Kūthā, in Iraq, 15

al-Lān. See Alans
Lahāzim, Arab tribal group, 368
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Reference(s)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Lakhi'athah (?) Yanuf, Dhu Shanatir, ruler over Himyar</td>
<td>188-91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Layth b. Bakr, Banu</td>
<td>276</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>L.r.wir (?)</td>
<td>place in Fars</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lu'ayy, Banu, of Quraysh</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lulyânûs, the Roman emperor Julian[us]</td>
<td>58-62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lîlayûús, the Roman emperor Julian[us]</td>
<td>58-62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lu’ayy, Banu, of Quraysh</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâ al-Samâ’ al-Namariyyah, Mâriyah bt. 'Awf, mother of the Lakhmid al-Mundhir I</td>
<td>124-25, 161, 163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ma’add, Arab tribal group</td>
<td>124, 345</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ma’âfîr, Yemeni cloth</td>
<td>169</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ma’di Karib, son of Abû Murrah al-Fayyâd Dhu Yazan</td>
<td>242, 244</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâh, Media</td>
<td>97, 296</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maḥmûd, the elephant sent against Mecca</td>
<td>228-29, 233, 235</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâhîây (?)</td>
<td>instructor of the cavalry-men, 403</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâjushnasfân, fire-temple in southwestern Persia</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâjusnas, son of Mihr Narsi, head of the department of the land tax</td>
<td>104-105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Makrân, 15, 102</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâlik b. al-Nadr, 181</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>manâr, lighthouse, 144</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>manâraḥ, tower, 118</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>manâzîr, frontier guard posts, 55 and n. 155</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mambij, 254</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mandab, Bâb al-Mandab</td>
<td>211</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâni, Mani, Manichaeans</td>
<td>238, 45, 149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mâni’s Gate, at Junday Sâbü̈r, 45</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mankah, Indian physician</td>
<td>66 n. 180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mansa’ah, near Yathrib, 167</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manûshîhir, legendary Kayanid ruler, 302, 309</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mârûq b. Abrahah, Abyssinian governor in Yemen</td>
<td>160, 236, 240, 242, 244-46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mas’ûd b. Mu’attib al-Thaqafi</td>
<td>223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>matmûraḥ, pl. matâmîr, underground storehouse, 10 and n. 33, 112</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mawriq, Maurice, Byzantine emperor, 304, 311-15, 317, 319, 383</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mawšîl, Mosul</td>
<td>14, 16, 322</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maysân, in Lower Iraq</td>
<td>13, 37, 408</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mazdak, son of Bâmâdâh, Mazdakites, 132-35, 148-49, 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M.dh.riyyah (?), 148</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mecca, 173, 224-29, 266, 273, 325, 327</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Medina. See Yathrib</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mih Adhar Jushnas, 400-401</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihisht, title</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihr Hurmuz, son of Mardânsâh, 395, 397-98</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihr Narsi, son of Burâzah, 99-100, 103-106, 108</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Term</td>
<td>Reference</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihr Narsi Hazarbandah, vizier of Yazdajir</td>
<td>72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihr Narsiyân, fire-temple in southwestern</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persia</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihrak, king of Abarsâ [?]</td>
<td>10-11, 40-42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihrân, Persian family</td>
<td>131-32, 288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>mikhâlîf, administrative division of Yemen</td>
<td>179 n. 462, 212, 249</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minwar, place in Hijâz</td>
<td>293</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mirbâ, place in northern Iraq</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihrân, king of Abarsas (?)</td>
<td>Io-II, 40-42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mihran, Persian family</td>
<td>131-32, 288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>mikhlâf, administrative division of Yemen</td>
<td>179 n. 462, 212, 249</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minwar, place in Hijâz</td>
<td>293</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mirbâ, place in northern Iraq</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minwar, place in Hijâz</td>
<td>293</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mirbâ, place in northern Iraq</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>mîbudhââm mûbadh, chief Môbedh</td>
<td>9 and n. 30, 90-92, 104, 119-20, 132, 245, 265, 285-87, 397</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mûdar, Arab tribal group</td>
<td>44, 67, 219</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mughammis, valley near Mecca</td>
<td>223-24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥallîm, river in eastern Arabia</td>
<td>291</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥallîm, clan of Shaybân</td>
<td>367</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allâh, the Prophet</td>
<td>163-64, 172-73, 175, 252, 266, 268-84, 330, 381, 413, 416</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. Iṣḥâq, râwî</td>
<td>146, 188, 199, 202, 214, 217, 221, 235, 251, 283, 331</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓî, râwî</td>
<td>199, 202</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. Khuzâ'î al-Sulami</td>
<td>218-20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. Sa'd, râwî</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wâqîdî, râwî</td>
<td>283, 413, 415</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muḥammad b. Yûsûf, brother of al-Ḥâjjâî</td>
<td>269</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Muḥâṣṣab, valley near Mecca</td>
<td>230</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mulûk al-Ṭawâ'îf, the Party Kings, the Parthians or Arsacids, 1, 3, 17, 22</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mundhir I b. al-Nu'mân I, Lakhmid ruler</td>
<td>83-89, 93, 124-26, 139, 159, 161, 163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mundhir II b. al-Mundhir I, Lakhmid ruler</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu'mân II, Lakhmid ruler</td>
<td>253, 353</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III, Lakhmid ruler</td>
<td>341-42, 370</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mân III al-Gharûr, last of the Lakhmids</td>
<td>372</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mûsâ, Moses, the Patriarch</td>
<td>275, 413-14, 416</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Muşâqqar, in eastern Arabia</td>
<td>291-93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mûshîl, Mushel, Armenian ruler</td>
<td>313</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muṭ'îm b. 'Adî al-Nawfâlî</td>
<td>234</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muzzbûwadh [?], adviser of Fârûz I</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nabâ, al-Anbât, the Nabataeans of Iraq</td>
<td>19 and n. 71, 375-76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-naḅatâ'iyah, Aramaic language</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nâbîghah, building of, in Yathrib</td>
<td>283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nâḏîrah bt. al-Ḍayzan</td>
<td>34-37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nahr Daqîlî, in Iraq</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nahr Jawbar, in Iraq</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nahrawân, in Iraq</td>
<td>254</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nahrawân river</td>
<td>304, 307-308</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>nâ'îbah, extraordinary levies</td>
<td>112 and n. 288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Najâf, 80, 142</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Najâshî, the Negus, king of Abyssinia</td>
<td>205-208, 211-18, 221, 232</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Najîr, Banû, (?) al-Najârah</td>
<td>165, 167, 284</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Najrân, 181, 192-96, 198-206</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nâkhirjâân, Persian commander</td>
<td>371</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nâmûdâr Jushnâs, 401</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nâmîr, Banû, 125, 161</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naqîsh-i Rustam, 3 n. 5, 14 n. 56</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narsî, Narseh, son of Sâbûr I, Sâsânîd emperor</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narsî, brother of Bahram Jûr, 99</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣr b. Rabî'ah, the house of the Lakhmids</td>
<td>370, 372-73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-nâs, leading men in the state, 11</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and n. 38, 27, 132</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Nâṭîf, of the Banû Salît</td>
<td>289</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nawzâdîh, son of Wâhriz</td>
<td>240</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naysâbûr, Nishâpûr, 58, 65, 128, 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Nimruz, "the region of the south," 395-97, 401
Niniwâ, Nineveh, 322
Nîrûfarr (?), ruler of al-Ahwâz, 12
Nişibîn, Nasibis, 28, 62, 321-22, 407, 409
Niw Khusrâw, commander, 401
Niwândukht, mother of Khusrâw I Anûsharwân, 128-29, 136
N.tîrâ (?), brother of the Khâqân of the Turks, 317
Nufâyîl b. Ḥâbib al-Khath'âmi, 221-23, 228, 230-31, 233-34
Nûh, Noah, the Patriarch, 413, 416
Nu'm, the gap or slope of, in Arabia, 188, 294 al-Nu'mân I b. Imrî al-Qays II, Lakhmid ruler, 75, 79-81, 124-25 al-Nu'mân II b. al-Aswad, Lakhmid ruler, 163 al-Nu'mân b. al-Mundhir I, Lakhmid, 85, 87-88, 139 al-Nu'mân b. Zur'ah al-Taghlibî, 359-60, 369

Paikuli inscription, 15 n. 60, 48 n. 141
Procopius, Byzantine historian, xvi

Qâbûs b. al-Mundhir III, Lakhmid ruler, 341, 370-71
Qadhûqiyâ'ah, Cappadocia, 29
Qafiz, measure of quantity, 260 and n. 267, 261
Qalîs, qullays, church at Ṣan'â', 217-21
Qâlûqiyâ'ah, Cilicia, 29
Qa'na'b al-Riyyâhi, 292
al-qa'rayatâyn, sc. Mecca and al-Ṭâ'îf, 187 qayl, miqwal, petty ruler in South Arabia, 185 and n. 473, 211, 287
Qays, Arab tribal group, 368
Qays b. Khuzâ'î al-Sulami, 219-20
Qays b. Mas'ûd, of Dhu al-Jaddayn, 356-57, 361, 367, 369
Qaysâr, Caesar, the Roman or Byzantine emperor, 28, 64-65, 157, 159, 205-207, 211, 220-21, 236-37, 253, 309, 315, 327, 329-30. See also Byzantium the Byzantines, and the Romans, al-Rûm
Qinnasrin, 254
Q.t.mah (?), Byzantine commander, 327
Qûbâd, Kavâd I, son of Fârûz I, Sâsânîd emperor, 126, 128-42, 152, 255-56, 377
Qûbâd, Kavâd II Shêrûy. See also Shirûyâh
Qûbâd Khurrah, town in the district of Ardashîr Khurrah, 130
Qûbah b. Ashyam al-Ki'nâ, 268-69
Qûdâ'ah, Arab tribal group, 20, 32-33, 35
qudât al-kuwar, judges of the provinces, 261
Quraysh of Mecca, 225, 227, 276-77, 283, 327
Qurayzâh, Banû, 165-66, 173
Qûsâyy, Banû, of Quraysh, 175
Qûsţânîn, Constantine, Roman emperor al-Qûtqûtânah, fortress in Iraq, 360

Rabi'ah, Arab tribal group, 44, 67, 356
Rabi'ah b. Naṣr, Lakhmid, 176-79, 182-83 al-Râhîṣâh, place near Dhu Qâr, 366 Râhzhâd, Persian commander
al-Râmâliyyâh, 56
Râmîbihisht, wife of Sâsân, 4-5
Râm-abzûd-Yazdajîrd, title, 83
Râm Ardashîr, town in Fârs, 11, 16
Râm Fayruz, town near al-Rayy, 112
Râm Hurmuz, town in Ahwáz, 12, 43, 138
Rathashtaran Sâlâr, rank of the supreme commander of the army, 104
Rawâḥah b. Sa‘d, of the Banû ‘Abs, 356
Rayhanah bt. ‘Algamah Dhi Jadan, 216, 242, 244
al-Rayy, 109, 112, 301
Rathashtaran Salar, rank of the supreme commander of the army, 104
Rawahah b. Sa’d, of the Banu ‘Abs, 356
Rayhanah bt. ‘Algamah Dhi Jadan, 216, 242, 244
al-Rayy, 109, 112, 301
Ri‘Am, sacred site of the Illyriens, 171–72
Riw Ardashir, R6shahr, on the coast of Fars, 16 al-Riyanus, Valerian, Roman emperor, 29–31
‘r.n.j.d.h (?), slave of Abrahah, 213
Romans, al-Rûm, the Roman empire, 2, 28, 51, 59–60, 63–65, 84, 103, 108, 137, 143, 159, 244, 325. See also Byzantium, the Byzantines, and Qays, Caesar, the Roman or Byzantine emperor
‘r.sh.sh.yât.y.n, legendary Persian archer, 302 al-Ruha, Edessa, 254
al-Rûmaqân, place in Iraq, 15
Rumiyûzân, Persian commander, 318
Rûshan Fayruz, town in Jurjan, 113
Rustam, son of Farrukh Hurmuz, 406–407
Sâbûr, Shâbûr II, Dhû al-Aktaf, son of Hurmuz II, Sassânid emperor, 49–67
Sâbûr, Shâbûr III, son of Sâbûr II, 68
Sâbûr, son of Afriyân, 313
Sâbûr, son of Bâbak, 8
Sâbûr of al-Rayy, 131–32
Sa‘d b. Bakr, Banû, 271–73, 282 al-Sadîr, palace of the Lakhmids, 81 al-Šafâ, fortress in eastern Arabia, 291
Safawân, the tâff of, 361
al-Sâ‘ib, kâhin or diviner, 331–32
Şâlih, ascetic follower of Faymîyûn, 196–98
Salît, dâwi, 366
Salît, Banû, 289
Salît b. Sa‘d, poet, 76
Salmâ, Sulmâ bt. Wâ‘il, mother of the Lakhmid al-Nu‘mân III, 241 al-Samâhi, place in eastern Arabia, 55
Samarqand, 143–44, 177
al-Samâwâh, in the Syrian Desert, 288
Sanbîl (?), place in Ahwaz, 12
Şanjîl, 203, 212, 217–21, 249
Sana, tribal group in Yemen, 287
Sanârtûq, king of al-Bahrayn, 15
Sarandib, Ceylon, 264
Sarjis, Sergius, Byzantine commander-in-chief, 312–13
Sâsân, forebear of Ardashîr I, 2–5, 23–24
Şa‘ṣa‘ah b. Nâjiyay al-Mujâshi’î, 289
Şâtîh, kâhin or soothesayer, 178–81, 183, 286–88
Sâwîd of Iraq, the, 14, 16, 56, 62, 97, 127, 140, 291, 300, 354, 380
Sâwâh, 285, 288
Sayf b. Dhî Yazan, Sayfân b. Ma’dî Karbî, 236–42, 249, 251, 264
Shâbah, ruler of the Turks, 298–99, 301
Shâdî Sâbûr, king of Išbâhan, 12
Shâdî Sâbûr or Dîm, town in Lower Iraq, 37 šâdurwûn, dam, 30 and n. 94
Index

Shafi' b. Kulayb, kāhin or soothsayer, 175
Shāhanshāh, title, 14 and n. 56
al-Shahbā', corps of troops in the Lakhmids' service, 79
Shāhin, Persian commander, 318, 321
Shahrām Fayruz, town in Azerbaijan, 113, 151
Shahrazur, town in Kurdistan, 33
Shahin, Persian commander, 318, 321
Shahin, Persian commander, 326-30, 400-403
Shahriyār, son of Khusraw II Abarwiz, 379-80
Shamir Dhū al-Janāh, Tubba' king in Yemen, 142-45
Shamir Yur'ish, Tubba' king in Yemen, 176-77
Sham'ta, son of Yazdīn, 398
Sham'un, Simon, the Apostle Simon Peter, 414
Shann, Banū, of 'Abd al-Qays, 392
Shaqīqah bt. Rabī'ah, mother of the Lakhmid al-Nu'mān I, 75
Sharāhīl and 'Abd al-Hārith, sons of 'Abd al-'Uzza b. Imri' al-Qays al-Kalbī, 77
Shaybān, Banū, of 'Abd al-Qays, 356, 363-65, 367
Shiqq, kāhin or soothsayer, 178, 181-83
Shīrāz, 110
Shirīn, wife of Khusraw II Abarwiz, 379-80, 389, 403
Shīrūyāh, Shērōy, Qūbād or Kawād II, ephemeral Sāsānīd emperor, 378-79, 381-99, 409
Shiz, fire temple of Adhur-Gushnasp, in Azerbaijan, 95, 97-98 sijill, sealed document, 6 and n. 18
Sijistān, Sistān, 15, 47, 65, 107, 116, 118, 380
Silhīn, fortress in Yemen, 209
Sind, Sindis, 65, 102, 150, 238, 243
Sinjūb, Khāqān of the Turks, 152-53
Sinnimār, builder of al-Khawarnaq, 75-76, 78
Şinnin, fortress near al-Ḥirah, 350
Sogdia, al-Ṣughd, 142
al-su'ādā', "the fortunate ones," corps of Persian troops, 400
Sūkhra, son of Wisābūr, called Qārin, 111, 116-18, 120, 127, 131-32, 302
sukhrāh, forced labour or corvée, 112
Sūl, people of the Dihistān steppes, 150-53
Sūl, the gates of, at the southeastern end of the Caspian Sea, 112-13
Sulaymān b. Dāwūd, King Solomon, 416
Sūq al-Ahwāz or Hurmuz Ardashīr, town, 12, 16
Surayd b. Abī Kāhil al-Yashkuri, poet
Surraq, district in Ahwāz, 12
Sūristān, Bēth Aramāyē, the Sawād of Iraq, 14
al-Ṣūs, Susa, 52, 65-66
Syria, 33, 79-80, 198, 229, 254, 270, 282-83, 286, 288

T

Tabaristān, 147
al-tāff, frontier zone of western Iraq, 361
Taghib, Banū, 55, 65
al-Ta'īf, 223, 253
tajmīr, garrisoning of troops along distant frontiers, 53 and n. 151, 383 Takrīt, 31
al-Ṭālqān, town in Bactria or Ṭukhāristān, 108
Tamīm, Banū, 55-56, 289-94, 360
Tansar, Kitāb, the Letter of Tansar, xviii, 17 n. 66
Tānūkh, Banū, 20-21, 79
Ṭaq-i Kīsrā, Aywān-i Kīsrā, palace at al-Madā'in, 332, 334-36
Ṭāshān, place in Ahwāz, 12
Tawwaj, town in Fārs, 65
Ṭawq b. Mālik, desert tract of, in Arabia, 188
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index</th>
<th>457</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ṭayyi', the two mountains of, 355</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tazid b. Ḥulwān, Banū, of Quḍā'ah,</td>
<td>32, 35-36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thakan, place in Arabia, 287</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Thāmir, man of Najrān, 200</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thaqīf, of al-Ṭā'i', 223</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tharthār river, in northern Iraq, 37</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thiyyadhūs, Theodosius II, Roman emperor, 86</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thiyyadhūs, Theodosius, brother of the emperor Maurice, 312-13</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thuwaybah, the Prophet Muhammad's foster-mother, 272</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tigris, river and its bridge, 52-53, 112, 285, 287, 322</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tihamah, coastal district of Yemen, 219, 226</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tinnin, seven-headed serpent, 197 and n. 493</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tirā, eunuch of Bābak, son of Sāsān, 6-7</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Ṭirbāl, palace at Jūr, 11</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ṭirūdīn, village near ʿĪṣākhr, 3</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Torah, al-Tawrāt al-ṣūrah, 412</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ṭūkhāristān, 109, 150</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turān, district of the modern Baluchistan, 15</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turkas, the Turkish lands, 51, 94ff., 152-53, 265, 297, 304, 314-17, 388</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tustar, Shushtar, in Ahwāz, 30</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tubān Asʿad Abū Karib, Tubba' II, 146, 164-78</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tubba' I, 176</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tubba' b. Ḥassān b. Tubba', 124, 142</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uabay b. Khalaf al-Jumāḥī, 326</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Ubay b. Wahb al-Tamīmī, 292</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-ʿUbbal, town in Lower Iraq, 357</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-ʿukhdūd, the trench at Najrān, asḥāb al-ʿukhdūd, the men of the trench, 195, 202, 204</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Umar I b. al-Khaṭṭāb, caliph, 206, 260</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Umar II b. 'Abd al-ʿAzīz, caliph, 336</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Umayr, Arab warrior at the Day of Dhū Qār, 364</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams, 268</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Umm al-Malik bt. 'Amr b. Ḥuṣr, al-Kindiyah, 163</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unays, keeper of the elephant Mahmūd, 225-26</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Urwa b. Ḥayyād al-Milāsī, 220</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Usfān, place in the Ḥijāz, 168</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uthman b. 'Affān, caliph, 268, 289</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-ʿUzza, pre-Islamic goddess, 281</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>W</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>wāḍāʾi', rates of taxation, 256</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wahb b. Munabbih, ṭawī, 195, 199, 331, 415-16</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wahriz, Persian commander in Yemen, 239-42, 245-52, 289, 294</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wārī, son of al-Nakhrījān, 147</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wastra'i'ushān Sālār, rank of the head of the department of the land tax, 104</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>W.r.z, king of the Hephthalites, 152</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>W.y.n (!), Persian governor in Yemen, 294, 373</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Y</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ya'fur, Tubba' commander, 143-44</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yakhṭīyānūs, Justinian, Byzantine emperor, 252-53, 255</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yaksūm b. Abrahāh, Abyssinian governor in Yemen, 235-36, 242, 244</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-Yamāmah, district of eastern Arabia, 55, 63, 253, 289</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ya'mar b. Nufāṭah al-Kināmī, 226</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ya'qūb, Jacob, the Patriarch, 416</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ya'qūb b. ʿIbrāhīm, ṭawī, 414</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yarbū', Banū, of Tamīm, 289</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yathrib, the Islamic Medina, 145, 164-74, 283-84</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yazdajīr I, son of Bahram IV, Sasanid emperor, 70-75, 82-83, 86-87</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Index

Yazdajird II, son of Bahram V Jur, Sasanid emperor, 106–109
Yazdajird III, son of Shahriyar, last Sasanid emperor, 380, 409–12
Yazid b. Himar al-Sakuni, 363
Yazid b. Iyas al-Nahshali, poet, 76
Yazid b. al-Mukassir b. Hanzalah, poet, 364
Yazid b. Mus’hir al-Shaybani, 363, 366
Year of the Elephant, in Meccan chronology, 268–69
Yemen, 106, 121, 149, 160, 170, 180, 183ff., 240ff., 264, 331, 373–75
Yusainus, Jovian, Roman emperor, 59–63

Z

Zabulistan, 150
Zadhi, Zadhuyah, ra’is al-khawal “Chief of the Servants,” 408–10
Zafar, in Yemen, 187
Zamzamah, Zoroastrian religious formula, muzamzimun “murmurs,” 377 and n. 932, 397
Zaradusht, son of Khurrakan, proto-
Mazdakite, 148–49
Zarawandadh, son of Mihr Narsi, 105
Zarawandadh, fire temple in southwestern Persia, 105
Zarmhri, son of Sukhræ, 128, 130, 134
Zayd b. ‘Amr b. Tubba’I, 176
Zayd b. Hammād, father of ‘Adi, 340 Zaynab bt. Aws, al-Ṭā’iyyah, wife of the Lakhmid al-Nu’man III, 355
Zindig, zandaqah, 38 and n. 118, 139, 142 Zoroastrians, al-Majus, Zoroastrianism, 2, 313–15, 325, 387, 412 al-Zuhri, Muhammad b. Muslim, rāwī, 336
Zur, place in Ḥijaz, 293
Zurwandadh or Zarawandadh, son of Mihr Narsi, Chief Herbadh, 104– 105
Zuṭṭ, gypsies, 94 n. 243